A COMPLETE BREAKDOWN.

"For ten years," says Jannie M. Harrell, of Wallaceburg, Ont., "I did not see a well day—was all broken down with dyspepsia, liver complain, catarrh and debility. Three doctors afraid and hope for me, when Burdock Blood Bitters came to my rescue. It is the best medicine I have ever taken. I say this for the benefit of all suffering as I did."

"Oh, no, I suppose you weren't intoxicated last evening when you came home?" Mrs. Dumbledigg to patient husband.

"No, I was merely tired and went into the library to enjoy my cigar."

"You were perfectly sober, were you?"

"Yes, perfectly."

"Then, please explain, if you can, how you came to mistake my bustle for your smoking cap and went to sleep with it on your head."

WILL TAKE OATH TO THE FACT.

Edward Cousins, of Ranson, declares he was at one time nearly dead form the effects of a terrible cold and cough. He tried many remedies but Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam was what cured him. He speaks in highes praises of it in other cases, and adds that he is willing to take oath to his statements.

A Sensible Young Wife.

Young Wife—How do you like my cooking! Come now give me your honest opinion. How does it compare with your mother's?

Young Husband—If you want my honest opinion, I will say your cooking is very fair, but not quite equal to mother's.

Y. W.—I did not expect it would be equal to your mother's, but I wish you to remember that your mother had many years experience before you were capable of forming judgment for her cooking.

Y. H.—By Jove, you are right I never would have thought of that, though I assure you I would have made no comments on your cooking if you had not asked for my honest opinion. The point you have made is a good one, but it is entirely overlooked by young married men.

Y. W.—It is, and unfortunately it is not thought of by young wives. The idea of any man saying to a girl just a year or two out of school, "You can't cook as well as mother," or "You don't manage as well as mother," and never taking into consideration that mother has had an experience of forty or fifty years! Suppose the young wife should turn round and retort, "You're not half as skilful a workman as my father?"

Y. H.—And I wonder she doesn't. It's a poor reel that won't work both ways.

And so it is when you come to think of it.

McGREGOR'S SPEEDY CURE.

THE social held at the residence of Mr. Bowes on Wednesday evening was a most enjoyable affair. There was a large turnout, and every one seemed to be in their happiest mood. DEATH OF A DURHAM MAN.—Mr. Mathew Staples, who at one time worked with W. A. Anderson, Blacksmith, of this town, died at the age of 33 years at Kamloops, B. C., on March 4th. MR. W. J. SHEPHERDSON of Euphrasia, auctioneer, sheep breeder, etc, etc., returned from a visit east on Saturday, and calling at the Mirror office showed us wool 19 inches in length, which he had taken from the back of a Cotswold ram lamb—said lamb being one of four purchased from Messrs, Russell and Weldrich of Thornhill, breeders. Mr. Shepherdson is bound to keep abrest of the times in the stock line.—[Mirror.

Mr. Rankin was well known to almost every resident of our town, and will long be remembered as a kindly old man, ever ready with a sympathetic heart and helpful hand to aid those in need. He will also be remembered as the surveyor of the whole of this northern portion of Ontario, and deserves more than a passing notice at our hands; but our space being limited this week, we reserve for another issue further particulars of one so widely known and respected throughout this section of country.—[O. EBENEZER TEA-MEETING.—The tea-meetnig held at Ebenezer church, Euphrasia Mission, on Wednesday evening last was a decided success. The evening being favorable and sleighing tolerable, the church was well filled. A good tea was served after which Mr. D. R. Ellis was voted to the chair, which position he filled in his customery easy and pleasant manner. The choir did good service and a number of snap speeches were given by local celebrities, after which John Lyons, Esq., gave a forcible address touching on various points, but chiefly on the all important question of the day—Home Rule. Rev. W. Casson followed with an able and deeply interesting speech on "The British Empire" which was a grand treat in itself, and was earnestly requested to be published in the STANDARD, but Mr. Casson intends giving the lecture in full before he leaves the circuit, perhaps on the 24th May, after which we may publish it. Proceeds of tea $26.

Salmon-Fishing in Canada.

BY W. J. BRUCE.

Camp Beatrice was probably the prettiest point between the Metapedia and Upsalquitch river, situated on the left bank or Quebec side of the Restigouche, and here, during the salmon season, did I live in right royal style.

This year, 1885, the salmon came in during the first week in June, and those fishermen who were fortunate enough to be "on the spot" had rare sport. I did not reach the fishing grounds till June 13, and found water in good condition, "but, ye gods!" a "drive" of logs was coming down Patapejaw, and my hope for good fishing was not at fever heat. Still, I was anxious to get at work. So, pulling up our canoes at this point, at four in the afternoon we commenced making camp. My Indians, Mattalac and Frank, were soon busy getting up the tents, while my other aids, a couple of lads, sons of a settler who lived a mile down the river, went into the woods to cut bark and boughs,—the former for my cook-house and Indian shelter, and the boughs for my bed.

In an hour Camp Beatrice was a fixed fact, and the stars and stripes run up a flagstaff thirty feet long.

While this work was going on I got my tackle in shape. I selected an eighteen-foot rod, made for me by Forrest, of Kelso, Scotland, a Jock Scott fly, attached to a single leader, and 100 yards of line completed the job.

"Now, Mattalac, the canoe!"

Ten minutes later, and we were at the head of Frog Island Pool, a favorite spot of mine, where in former years I had hooked many a thirty-pounder.

Mattalac, in the bow of the canoe, and Frank at the stern, all expectant, sit with eyes strained in the direction of my cast; once, twice, thrice, the fly falls lightly on the quiet, smooth, and glassy pool; no rise.

Strange! it is just the evening for salmon. The sun has just gone down behind the "aq wit for targossen" (Squaw's Cap), a grand old mountain on our left, and there are but few logs coming down. Again I make a longer cast, and this time,—oh, blissful moment in the angler's life!—a ripple, then a lightning dash! splash! a graceful curve of his tail and he is my prisoner. Whirr! Whizz! and fifty yards of line spin from my reel. Now Mattalac, old man, up anchor, and steady! follow him, lads! "He's going up stream, sir, and is a whopper too!" replies the Indian, and at this moment the fish showed himself by shooting straight out of the water, with a graceful spring, and, throwing a double back summersault, that would kill a circus-tumbler with envy, fell back.

"Oh, he is a beauty!" I volunteered; forty pounds if an ounce. Now up he goes again, this time showing his beautiful silver sides in the fading sunlight, and coming down with a "thud" that sent the spray flying up in millions of diamond jets.

"That was a splendid leap," said I, lowering my rod, to save both fish and strain.

Whir-r-r! Whizz! round spins the reel, with that peculiar musical sound that has no parallel. Will he never stop? I have but a few strands left. "Hurry! fast! fast!—he has almost taken the length of my line—and I boast one hundred yards. Aha!" he stops, and I begin to reel homeward; he is coming up, and I gather him in "lively." This time he comes home splendidly, and, after a moment's halt, I feel I have him well in hand, when the villain stops dead still, and I could no more move him than if he were the Egyptian obelisk in Central Park. For thirty minutes did his royal highness "sulk" now and then rubbing his nose on the pebbles, which action was telephoned to me by the peculiar grating sensation that ran down the rod.

Shade of Isaac Walton! how he holds, and as I gently "give him the butt," my beautiful forest rod forms a graceful curve almost double bent. "Light my pipe for me, Mattalac," said I; "this fellow means to remain here all night. I can stand it if he can."

So, while the Indian picks my pipe and tobacco from my pocket, I hold my prisoner taut. "Now, a match, old man." Mattalac places the pipe in my mouth, as I have my hands full; he strikes a match. Just as he was about to light my pipe, which he had placed between my lips—Whirr! whizz! r—r—r—r—r! away goes my line again Mr. Salmon has rested long enough, and now gives me a good evidence of his strength and vitality. Away he goes, and away I go after him; he making for a very nasty spot of heavy water. Great Scott! If he gets into the current I am sure to lose him! Never mind; up, and away we go, the canoe bouncing like a shell down the rapid. We are being towed by the silver-sided darling. The lower pool is now reached, and the fish has stopped. Tug, tug, tug; he is game yet, not half gone yet;—he weakens; I reel in. Come along, darling, come along! reel in! reel in! a wabble, and he turns over lazily. "We've worn him, old Mattalac! There is a nice spot over yonder on the bank; let me get ashore, old man;" and landing, we got ready for the capture. Mattalac, lying on his stomach like a panther, waited till I reeled the fish close to the bank. A quick dash! and the gaff is in his side; splash, splash, and the beauty is lying on the grass: A blow from the Indian's small club finishes the deed, and I sit admiringly on the bank beside a thirty-nine pound Restigouche salmon.

A Plea for Reading Matter in the Home.

BY REV. DR POTTS.

In this paper I wish to give a few hints along the line of intellectual progress and enjoyment. Few parents but talk over and consult together about household expenses. Coal is laid in for the winter. Clothing is provided for the family, and, if means allow it, without stint.

General education and accomplishments for the fair sex of the home are not forgotten. In a fair average home, what provision is made in the way of providing reading matter? Is it usual to have a family consultation as to the papers and magazines which shall be taken, and which are as needful for true family life as bread from the baker and meat from the butcher. This matter is worthy of serious, thoughtful action upon the part of parents and grown up sons and daughters.

Let me suppose the family to be seated around the table at the pleasant evening meal. I will venture a few hints to awaken attention to this highly important matter, and possibly guide to a wise conclusion.

Am I met at the outset by the remark, "This is a new way of putting this subject?" A thousand readers, if they were in the confessing mood, would say we never looked upon providing literature for our families as something for which we were responsible in the same way that we felt responsible for housing, feeding and clothing our children. My object is to lead all such to genuine repentance, and to "bring forth fruits worthy of repentance." I think there should be at least three newspapers taken into every home—possibly four.

One should be political and general. Political leaning will determine the paper. Every citizen of this Dominion should be interested in the government of the country. Citizenship is a sacred trust, and to fulfil it we need all possible information. It is not a mortal sin to read and ponder impartially, if that be possible, the views of the paper representing the other side of politics. It is not necessary for the people of this country to believe that the leading public men of the land are false and unprincipled. The prominent party papers have a good deal to answer for in traducing public men who disagree with them in the affairs of the country. An independent paper is a useful go-between.

The second paper should be a good literary paper, adapted socially and morally for healthy family reading. Such papers have not had the encouragement in this country that they have deserved. They are far removed from the bitterness of political party, and fulfil a fine educational mission in the home-circle. A religious journal should be a weekly visitor and that, the paper published by the church to which the reader belongs. For many denominational reasons, you should support your own church organ; it gives most valuable information upon the educational, missionary and evangelistic movements and progress of the church. It is almost impossible for you to have an intelligent sympathy with the general work of your section of the church, unless you read the paper it publishes.

The educated young people of the home are not likely to be satisfied with newspaper literature, however good. Their minds will go out after high class periodical literature. If several cannot be had, let one first-class monthly be welcomed to the home. One can hardly go far astray in making choice of the monthly visitor, while such are available as "Harper's," "The Century," "The Contemporary," and many others that I might name.

Now let us rise to the consideration of books, as essential to, and not a mere luxury of life. Let me put a few questions to the family that I have had before my mind. How many books have you in your house? How many do you buy yearly for the intellectual nourishment of your minds? How often do you go into a book store, for the avowed purpose of buying books, as part of the duty you owe yourselves, and the position you occupy in society? You should keep abreast of the age, and books are as needful as railways, telegraphs and telephones. Indiscriminate buying of books is as sensible as indiscriminate buying of dry goods or groceries. In the multitude of books, you need not only to exercise your best judgment, but to secure the advice of competent friends in the various departments of literature. A bad book is only fit for kindling material. It may do harm before it reaches the stove, therefore keep it out of your house, as you would a person of evil character. No need to have even indifferent books, when you may have choice books in every department of letters. I know it is bewildering to the mind, when you confront the duty of making choice of a limited number.

As a rule, I am not prejudiced in favour of subscription books, but I have been examining one lately which agreeably disappointed me.

The subject of history is so vast that many stand aghast at its huge proportions, and despairingly say, "I must not attempt the impossible." To such whose time for reading is limited, I would recommend "Ridpath's History of the World." It is in three volumes. The work, of course, is condensed, but comprehensive and clear. In the absence of being able to give the time needful for the reading of general history, which may be had in volumes reaching far into the hundreds, the three volumes referred to will be a good substitute.

Let me indulge the hope that my ideal family will act upon the hints thrown out. The papers and magazines are ordered, and the books are coming gradually to enrich the library shelves. Now what use shall be made of them? There are odd minutes which may be utilized by having a book selected and at hand. But I plead for far more than this. I ask that work be so arranged that at least an hour daily be given to systematic reading. It is the very least that should be given to the improvement of both mind and heart. I assume that religious reading shall have its proper place, and that therefore the heart as well as the intellect shall be cultured.

Do I hear our readers saying, "This whole subject is looking more serious and important than it has ever appeared before?"

Which is the more excellent way? The plan I have suggested, or the old hap-hazard style of buying now and again, and without thought. Looking at this question apart from the intellectual pleasure that comes from the acquisition of knowledge, the people of this country, who are going to win distinction in life and prosper in their business shall be the well read intelligent men and women of the Dominion.

The citizens of Augusta Ga., are talking about resorting to force to drive the Chinese out of the town. It has long been the headquarters of Chinese immigration South, and there are hundreds there; and many new arrivals and the promise of more seem likely to result in a decided anti-Chinese movement.

A prosperous farmer of Owingsville, Ky., a well-preserved widower of over fifty, has two sons who were both in love with the same girl. She found difficulty in deciding which to take, and the old man solved the problem by sending the boys off on business and marrying the girl himself while they were away.

A Wonderful Feat.

As the south-bound freight train left Gridley station the other afternoon, a number of the citizens were eye-witnesses of a scene that made the blood in their veins run cold. A tramp was trying to "beat" his passage on the train, and attempted to get on a brake-beam. He missed his reckoning, and his feet dragged on the tracks between the rails. The train was moving about six miles per hour. To let go was certain death. He struggled frantically to get his feet on the brake-beam, but failed. Meanwhile, the spectators were horrified, and many turned their eyes away from the scene. At last, by an almost superhuman effort, he got both feet up between his hands against the brake-bar of which he had a hold, and after swinging several times until his body had gained sufficient momentum, he let go with his hands and shot out under the car head first, and landed on his back on the side of the embankment, down which he rolled into a mud puddle. His face was devoid of color when he arose, the palms of his hands were bleeding, and he trembled as if suffering from a severe chill. His adventure and marvelous escape aroused the sympathies of those who witnessed the knock at "death's door," and a collection of several dollars was promptly taken up and given him. He was a robust young man of about 25 years of age, and owed his life to his strength and agility.

A Lucky Man.

"A lucky man is rarer than a white crow," says Juvenal, and we think he knew. However, we have heard of thousands of lucky ones and we propose to let their secret out. They were people broken down in health, suffering with liver, blood and skin diseases, scrofula, dropsy, and consumption, and were lucky enough to hear of and wise enough to use Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery," the sovereign blood purifier, tonic and alterative of the age.

"We feel," writes a Western editor, "that an apology is due to Widow Grimes. In our issue of last week we stated that she had eloped with an eighteen-year-old man. The truth was that she was thrown from an eight-year old mare, which she was riding to a lope, and which slipped and fell. Mistakes will happen in the best-regulated newspaper offices; and we are confident that when we state the item was sent over a telephone wire, no other apology will be needed."

THE McDONALDS.

Romance of the Canada Line in 1812-15.

BY T. M. B.

CHAPTER I.—LOVE.

"Rory, you must not cross the river to-me again. They may settle it, of course, d then all will be right. But now, don't k it, Rory, don't; for my sake if not for r own!"

"And why for no, Jessie? What's up, any w? What is there to settle? If you n that any of those young Yankee blades ect to my coming to see you, I'll settle m pretty quick!" and the speaker lifted stalwart arm, and showed a fist that ght have felled an ox.

This private and confidential conversation which our story opens occurred about beginning of June in the year of Grace, on the south bank of the mighty St.
wrence, which then, aanow, poured down ncessing tide in placid lakes and roar-rapids to the salt and sounding sea, to be forever in its briny depths.

Where the young people stood was on the ted States side of the boundary line, where the Indian village of St. Regis stands, where the colours of Uncle Sam, the red cross of England fly in close imity, and it would be as well at once t the "gentle reader" know the why wherefore of the meeting.

The stalwart youth called by the girl,
Rory" was a young man of Highland tch descent, whose full and true patron-was Roderick McDonald. An able ied chief was Roderick, one that would ke the sturdiest hesitate before intermed-g with him. Over six feet high in his kings and still growing, with clear gray healthy complexion and curly, auburn
, he looked the beau ideal of a young well to do Scotch Canadian. His par-and his four brothers, all older and er than himself, lived across the St. Law-e, a few miles below where the town of wall stands, in the County of Glengarand the reason of his visiting this seclud-rysting place "across the lines" was the y natural and pardonable one of wishing e the girl of his heart, the blue-eyed, n haired Jessie, like himself a Mc-ald, and of the same, though somewhat nt, kin.

It is not necessary to go into rhapsodies, customary with story tellers in describ-their heroines, in recounting the manifold ms of the fair Jessie. Suffice it to say, she had the most beautiful and luxuri-brown hair, the most bewitching blue
, the reddest lips, the fairest brow and most perfect form of any girl in the d, at least so the bold Rory thought, ich amounts to the same, so we hope our d readers all, including the ladies, will e with him, for remember this was a time ago, and anyone who has seen present generation of bonnie lasses who our heroine as great grandmother will be likely to dispute Rory's good taste.
is not the intention of the writer, oh!
d reader, to go into the history of the ious clans of McDonalds and McDonnells bers of whom came across the seas to erica in the last century, or touch upon r genealogical tree, for without even be-pathetically besought to do so, like the less woodman of song we will "spare for everybody who knows anything is re of the fact that the pedigree of the Donalds extends so far back that the of man has never yet found its root.
re is no doubt, however, and we give this rmation for the benefit of the more aris-tic portion of our readers who would rally like the leading characters in the they deign to read to be of "good ly,") that the chiefs of both clans, Mc-ald and McDonnell, were, like Tubal of old, "men of might," and had ands of red shanked wassals at their mand when the Roman Emperor Cali-
, with his short sworded legions, were ght to a halt on the margin of the ed.

t this has got nothing much to do with story, neither the dignities of the clans the occupation of Britain by the ans, but some centuries later circum-ces arise, the merits or demerits of h it is not in our province to speak, a Dutch Prince and soldier visited "Lord's Anointed" from the throne, which ulting created, to say the least, a great sity of opinion on the matter. Not a while after, when it was a toss up ben another "wee German lairdie" and ung gentleman of the name of Stuart, the young cavalier, alias the Blackbird,
Bonnie Prince Charlie, it is a melany fact that most of the McDonalds and Donnells took up arms in the cause of graceful and graceless and flighty ckbird," and it was only after a certain ch noble enrolled a large party of vol-rs composed of these disaffected clans-to fight for the King in America that pains and penalties attached to the "Jaite" were removed from them.

Rory's forefathers came out with General fe and distinguished themselves (in the ) on the gory Plains of Abraham, when olm was killed and Quebec taken from French, but it was only in the beginning the present century that Jessie's father igrated from the land of the heather to of cookies and doughnuts, and it must confessed that the old man was as staunch, not a stauncher Jacobite and a greater er of the "Hanoverian" than ever.

So it came to pass that although Rory's r lived under the "Meteor Flag" of land and Jessie's under the folds of the torious Star-spangled Banner," the young s didn't make either politics or the broad er St. Lawrence a barrier between them, d from the time the young people saw other at a "quilting bee" (they had ting parties in those days, fair reader, gh not of the crazy quilt order) they me lovers "fond and true." And now re back to where we started.

"Oh, Rory," said the girl, "haven't you rd the news, the dreadful news?"

"Ye Jessie, my dear, I've heard of noth-dreadful lately except, perhaps, that Angus McTavish thrashed red Peter Glengarry last Monday, and they say that if she——"

"Ah, Rory, I don't mean anything like
t. They say there's going to be war ween the States and everybody here is in a great state of excitement. The men are burnishing and oiling the locks of their rifles, and there's nothing talked of but war, war! Besides, they vow vengeance on all Britishers, and—and—you're one you know, Rory, and ah, oh"—and the poor girl laid her weeping face on Rory's broad and willing shoulder.

"See here!" said the young man, "Jessie, don't cry, like a good girl. I'm not afraid of all the Yankees in New York State (good boy, Rory; Jessie hears you); but if this war you speak of happens of course it won't do for me to come here, for that might bring your folks into trouble, and see here, Jessie, if the war does come, I suppose I'll shoulder my musket as I'm in duty bound to do. Everybody stick up for his own colors, Jessie, you know. There, don't cry; perhaps its all talk, but any way its high time for me to cross the river, and now, Jessie, give me a kiss to remember you till we meet again," and Rory jumped into his skiff and was off.

"Till we meet again," said the disconsolate Jessie.

It was a long time before they met again.

CHAPTER II.—WAR.

Rory hadn't long to wait the confirmation of the rumors spoken of by his inamorata.

On the 18th of June, a few weeks after the interview by the river, war was declared by Uncle Sam, and some 25,000 regulars and 50,000 volunteers were called out for active service. We will not go into the rights or wrongs of the war, which have nothing to do with this true story, merely remarking that the assumption on the part of Great Britain that she had a right to search American, and in fact all "foreign" vessels on the high seas, and take therefrom, nolens volens, those of the crew born under the British flag, under the plea once a subject always a subject, did'nt go down with the Yankees, who vowed that they would stand it no longer; hence the advent of that gory monster, among the happy and peaceable inhabitants of Canada and the States.

"Grim-visaged war,"

In Upper Canada at this time there were about 3000 regulars, and some 1500 in the lower province, so of course the regular forces being inadequate to tackle the American troops a call was made for volunteers.

Immediately after war was declared, that exceedingly stupid and withal incompetent officer, Sir George Prevost, then commandant in Canada and shortly afterwards got consumedly thrashed by the Yankees at Lake Champlain, issued an order that all Americans should leave British soil within fourteen days. The war feeling waxed exceedingly hot on both sides, and soon the ball commenced.

Among the first regiments of volunteers raised in Upper Canada was the "Glengarry Fencibles," composed almost altogether of McDonalds, McDonells, Frasers and other Highland clansmen or their descendants, under the command of Col. McDonald, and a strapping, not to say hostile looking lot of stalwarts they were. Of course our friend Rory was among the first to enroll himself in the ranks, put on his old red "coatee" and shoulder a venerable "Brown Bess" more remarkable for its kicking qualities than its reliability to fire or its accuracy of aim, and in a very short time he found himself on the Niagara frontier doing "sentry go!" under that valiant and meritorious officer, Gen. Sir Isaac Brock, who, as every one knows, fell while leading his command to "glory" on the blood-stained heights of Queenston.

Rory, after this engagement, was promoted to the high and dignified position of lance corporal, he being by this time well up in his drill, having served with Brock on the Detroit frontier where Hull, to the intense disgust and indignation of the Americans, surrendered. After Brock's death, Gen. Sheaffe took command of the British, and in spite of the many energetic attempts of the Americans under Gen. Smith to permanently occupy the colony, managed to hold his ground.

It is not necessary or advisable to follow our hero through the different hard marches, bivouacs and battles that he underwent in his two years of bloody experience. He was among the Highlanders who checked the Americans at Burlington when the latter attempted to get possession of the military stores there, and who afterwards visited Toronto, where they not only succeeded in blowing up the Britisher's works, but some hundreds of their own people, including their brave but unfortunate commander, Gen. Pike.

Nor do we intend to relate the manifold adventures of the bold Rory when on picket duty along with the unrelenting and savage allies of the British, the Indians, under their cruel and bloodthirsty chief, Joe Brant, or how often he risked his life to save that of some unfortunate wounded Yankee, whose ill luck placed him in the hands of these infuriated and unforgiving savages.

But one night Rory had an adventure that he remembered until his dying day, as it resulted sometime after in securing him the happiness of his future life.

Rory was now full corporal and in command of an outlying picket some two miles from the main camp, near the rapids of the tumultuous Niagara, and, as he and his comrades, placed at intervals, were peering through the underbrush or traversing the woods on the line of out-posts, they were startled by a sound that often before and since that time, struck terror to the heart of the pale face, the dread war-whoop of the Indians.

"Close up, boys!" shouted Rory, "advance! Let's see what's the row about, the reds have caught some poor devil for certain." The party closed and advanced a few yards, and then, with his arms pinioned firmly and a painted and hideous looking Chippewa on either side, tomahawk in hand ready to brain him, they beheld a wounded American officer. He was fainting from loss of blood, exposure and fatigue, and as the picket came up he turned his beseeching eyes on Rory which plainly said, "Don't let them murder me," and fell to the ground.

The Indians with one accord raised their tomahawks, and in a moment it would have been all up with their prisoner, when Rory shouted, "Hold! Stop!" and his little command rushed up with fixed bayonets while the Chippewas dropped their murderous hands and scowled at the red coats.

"No, no. Caw win! caw win," replied the savages fiercely. "Yankee our prisoner, must come with Indian."

"No," said Rory, knowing that a painful and lingering death would be the American's fate if they ever got him to their camp. "No, no, we want him with us. Let him go!"

"Caw win, nichi. Sha-ga-naus," yelled one of the fierce savages, whose temper, not one of the sweetest at any time, got beyond his control, "Caw win," and he hurled his tomahawk at the head of our hero, which, had it "found its billet," would have closed his career and this story instanter.

But Rory, anticipating such a salute, just managed to dodge the hatchet, and big Angus Fraser, without more ado, ran his bayonet through the Indian's body, while his dusky comrades with a yell that frightened the squirrels for miles around, jumped like a greyhound for the cover of the woods, and disappeared.

Big Angus, like many more, had grown rather callous during the war, and he remarked to Michael Doherty, his rear rank man: "She's a good runner thon, Michael.'

"Faith he is," replied his chum. "Sure a heagle cuddent cotch him. Be me sowl, Angus, 'tis a shame for good Christians loike me and you to foight be the soide of such murdherin thieves!"

The American was soon unbound and brought to head quarters by Rory and his detachment, (Rory, by the way, saying nothing about the death of the Indian) and as he was badly wounded he was soon exchanged and sent over to the American camp. Rory didn't even know his name nor, faith, did he care much what it was.

ANOTHER WARNANG.—Last Wednesday evening a man by the name of Perry, from Duntroon was driving home on a wagon load of lumber, and being slightly under the influence of liquor he drove his horses too close to the deep ditch in front of Cameron's garden, and the wagon and load upset into the ditch. Mr. Perry fell underneath the load, and was crushed and mangled in a frightful manner. He was extracted with considerable difficulty and taken to Poplar Hotel where he breathed his last about an hour after the accident happened this is indeed a solemn warning to those who indulge in the social glass.—[Collingwood Bulletin.

Practical Recipes.

SAUSAGES —If fried, it must be long and gently, but they are much better if baked in the oven with a little water. This steams and thoroughly cooks them; they should be baked until nicely browned and they will not be as dry as when fried. Serve with potatoes, cider apple sauce, plain stewed apples without sugar or sour pickles.

COOKIES —One cup of powdered sugar, one half cup of butter, one egg, one half cup of sour milk, one-half teaspoonful of soda sifted three times through two cups of flour; one half of a small nutmeg and a handful of raisins Rub the butter and sugar to a cream, then add the egg, milk and spice and last the flour. Roll thin, cut into round cakes and bake in a quick oven, pressing one raisin into the centre of each cooky.

ROLL PUDDING —Rub a piece of butter the size of an egg into one quart of flour in which has been sifted two teaspoonfuls of cream-tartar and one teaspoonful of soda. Mix with sufficient sweet milk to make a dough that can be rolled out. After rolling it out into a sheet, spread with any kind of fruit, fresh canned or preserved and then roll up, being careful to fold the ends so that the fruit will not run out. Steam one hour and eat with a sauce.

SOFT MUFFINS—One quart of milk, three eggs, one teaspoonful of salt, a piece of butter the size of an egg, four tablespoonfuls of yeast, and sifted flour to make a stiff batter. Warm the milk and butter together, and add the salt; beat the eggs very light and stir them into the milk and butter; then stir in the yeast and last the flour. Cover the mixture and set it to rise for three hours or until light in a warm place. Bake in muffin rings or heated gem irons until a light brown. May be mixed at night and used for breakfast.

POCKETBOOK ROLLS.—Take at noon one pint of morning's milk, a piece of butter half as large as an egg, one tablespoonful of sugar and a little salt; boil all together and when cool add one-half cup of yeast (or one-half of a yeast cake dissolved in one-half cup of water) and two quarts of flour; knead as you would bread and set in a warm place to rise. It will be light by six o'clock in the evening; then knead it again. At nine o'clock knead it down again, using as little flour as possible. In the morning roll out without kneading about half an inch thick, cut out, spread very thin with butter, fold over, put in a buttered pan and after letting them rise a few minutes bake.

Household Hints.

A delicately made salad is hardly out of place anywhere. It may be served with roasts of every description, if we except game, and is even acceptable with boiled or fried fish.

Paper bags in which many articles are sent from the grocery stores should be saved for use when blacking a stove. You can slip the hand into one of these and handle the brush just as well and the hand will not be soiled at all, and when through with them they can be dropped into the stove, being much preferable to the cloth bag or mitten, which requires frequent washing.

The tiny red ants which are such a nuisance in many pantries may be easily driven away if kerosene is freely used. Those who have been troubled by them know that they always come in lines, coming through some crevice in the wall or floor, and following one after the other in regular order until they reach the shelf above. If kerosene is turned the entire length of this line also on the place where they come in, the floor, etc., they will soon depart. You may need to repeat this a few times, but it is an easy and effectual method of getting rid of them. Leave the door and windows open awhile and the scent of kerosene will soon be gone.

The proper way to prepare beef tea for a sick person is to cut a good, tender, juicy steak in small bits, broil slightly on a hot griddle, and squeeze the juice by the use of a lemon squeezer in a cup previously heated; season with a pinch of salt and pepper, and administer at once in teaspoon doses. This is the pure blood of the beef, and without doubt is both food and strength for the patient. It should always be squeezed into a coffee or tea cup or previously heated, as, it is allowed to cool and then is heated, it becomes curdled and is unfit for use. In this way, properly seasoned to suit the patient's taste, it is very palatable and rarely ever nauseates. Having had a great deal of experience in sick, I have found more good results follow from the use of beef blood so prepared than by the use of all the beef teas ever made.

Why do we Have Eggs at Easter!

Easter is observed among all Christian people as the anniversary of the great event of the resurrection of Christ. He was dead, but returned to life. The egg is taken as emblematic of a return to life. It is to all appearance dead, but we know that if placed under proper conditions, life will come forth from it. The use of eggs at Easter was adopted from an usage older than our era. It was the custom in very early times to celebrate the return of spring by making presents of eggs.

"Why does not Easter always fall upon a fixed day. Christmas is always on December 25th, why should Easter be fixed with equal certainty?" Easter must be on Sunday. It is not a particular date that is observed, but a particular Sunday. How to decide upon the Sunday, gave very early churches much trouble, and there were differences on the account, but the matter was settled at that council held at Nice, in the year 325. The rule was adopted that: "Easter day is always the first Sunday after the full moon, which happens upon or next after March 21st, and if the full moon happens on a Sunday, Easter day is the next Sunday after. This gives Easter day a wide range of dates, as it may occur on any Sunday from March 22nd to April 25th.

A writer on meteorology says: "We know of no such thing as absolute cold." He should have stood on a street corner about an hour a few days ago. He also says that "cold is simply a negative, being a comparative absence of the positive, which is heat." We have frequently noticed that. When a man is freezing to death it must be a great comfort for him to know that there is no such thing as cold, and that what ails him is a "comparative absence of the positive."

Nature is frank and will allow no man to abuse himself without giving him a hint of it.

One breach of faith will always be remembered, no matter how loyal your subsequent life may be. People may imagine that they trust you, yet all the time they have an eye to the former break.

YOUNG FOLKS.

Jumbo Marching Again

The little folks may be glad to learn something about the great elephant. You all remember the story of his being brought from the zoological garden in London to the United States, and that he was killed last September by the cars at St. Thomas, Ont. Well, Jumbo has been reconstructed, made over, built up, stuffed, set on his feet and looks almost as good as new. In fact two Jumbos have been made out of one. The skin and the skeleton were sent to Rochester to Professor Ward, the naturalist, who has been four months in getting the restored Jumbo, and the skeleton Jumbo ready to trail and move. Now this work has been done so well, that you would almost think him alive. His skin weighed fifteen hundred pounds. When alive Jumbo weighed seven tons and stuffed he weighs three tons.

The skeleton will be to many the more interesting of the two Jumbos. The skin was badly demolished by the freight train that killed Jumbo, yet the restoration has been so perfectly done that a critical examination has to be made to discover any indications of the smash-up. Every bone of the huge mammal has been carefully fastened in its proper place and they are all firmly secured ready for traveling.

Professor Ward in a letter to Mr. Barnum says: "Every bone in its colossal framework has not only been made to keep its proper place in the anatomy but the whole has been made so strong that I think it will bear the quite unusual strain to which it will be subjected in traveling. It has special mechanical adjustments for raising and lowering, applying and taking off its legs etc. This is, I believe, the only mounted skeleton of an adult African elephant in this country. It is an interesting and a satisfactory coincidence that it is at the same time the largest skeleton of a modern terrestrial mammal in the world."

Then an elephant was built up of solid wood of Jumbo's exact form and size. Over this was put his skin and this was nailed and screwed into place over the entire surface and along the seams. There were seventy-four thousand, four hundred and eighty nails used in the work. These nails were partly driven before the skin thoroughly dried, and when it had shrunk all it would they were driven out of sight.

To look at him you would think he was without a bone, and that his "department of the interior" was all wood, iron, clay and hair. I asked a gentleman who was looking at him: "How many little boys could play horse inside of him if the space was clear," and he said at once, "why from a dozen to fifteen!"

Just think of it, one of his toe nails is nearly six inches from one side to the other or as long as an ordinary lead pencil. One of his teeth was about the same length. Then think too how much candy such an elephant could eat!

The glass for his eyes was colored especially for the purpose. His bones are fastened together with brass bolts. Silver-headed screws fasten his great toes to the base on which he stands.

Jumbo was born in Central Africa in 1861 and was only twenty four years old when he was killed.

A special car for him has been built in Philadelphia. He leaves Rochester this week and goes to Bridgeport, Connecticut, for Barnum, who will probably make more money out of him dead than alive. He will be placed on a wagon twenty-five feet long and nine feet wide, that weighs 6,500 pounds, especially constructed for him and containing machinery by which the bed may be raised or lowered. On this he will be drawn on a car fifty feet in length and so arranged that the bottom is within six inches of the road-bed in order to allow its precious load to remain upright and still pass under railroad bridges and through railroad tunnels.

This last week Jumbo had a reception. Representatives of Mr. Barnum and editors from New York and several other citys came to look at these two Jumbos before he starts out on his trip Prof. Ward prepared cards upon which was pictured a tombstone bearing an incription to the memory of the deceased elephant. He made an address to these representatives and told them of the work and its difficulties and presented each visitor with a souvenir consisting of a piece of Jumbo's tusk, suitably inscribed.

A great many little children in Rochester have been to see the two elephants made out of one.

Ruby-Headed Humming Birds.

See what dear little birds we have here. They are so tiny and so beautiful. The plumage of these small creatures is wonderful, so great a contrast in color is seen upon them. Their little heads and nape of their necks is of the brightest ruby color, while the chin, throat and chest are yellow. The tail is reddish, with a black tip, and the under part of the body is a dark olive brown. Poor little beautiful birds, their beauty is the cause of their death too often, for their pretty little bodies are very frequently to be seen in cases of stuffed birds.

These birds are found in South America and the West Indies.

Do you see the funny nest the little birds make for themselves? It is very beautiful as well as curious; it is pointed at the bottom; most delicately woven with all sorts of fine threads like spider's web, and it is fastened to some long drooping leaf in a most ingenious manner. From its position the nest is safe from many of the dangers which are apt to assail little birds when building.

The little hen-bird is not so pretty as her mate; her coloring is not nearly so decided, as she has scarcely any ruby shades about the head, or yellow on her throat.

I am sure you must wish that we had some of these dear little birds in America. They would look like lovely butterflies flying about, only much nicer, because they are dear little sensible birds that might get tame and eat out of our hands. But humming-birds could never live in our country. They require a hot climate, such as they have in the West Indies.

A little boy whose sprained wrist had been relieved by bathing in whiskey surprized his mother by asking: "Did papa ever sprain his throat when he was a boy?"

SCIENTIFIC.

Flannels are best washed in tepid water, prepared beforehand with soap and a teaspoonful of ammonia.

Cold rain-water and soap will take out machine grease where other means would not be advisable on account of colors running, etc.

To preserve and mount sea weed, place it in a large bowl of water above a suitable sized piece of glass. Press between sheets of blotting paper.

No healthy person need be too stout if only proper attention is paid to diet. Those so afflicted should abstain from, or eat very sparingly of potatoes, sugar, bread, butter, and all fatty or starchy kinds of food; while, in the matter of drinks, milk and chocolate are to be avoided. A stout person may partake freely of lean meat, green vegetables, and fresh fruit. Nuts are to be avoided, as they are oily and therefore fattening.

To prevent mental bankruptcy, avoid, first, excessive indulgence of the emotions; second, frantic desultory efforts to accomplish in one hour an amount of mental work appropriate to double that amount of time; third, every species of excess which experience has proved leads to general constitutional drain; fourth, attempting to do two things at one and the same time; fifth, petty social and other engagements which interfere with the function of sleep; sixth, indigestible food.

The Lancet publishes an article giving an account of the successful treatment of carbunculous diseases by the injection of the officinal solution of ammonia. Dr. Arendine claims that it destroys the bacillaria in all malignant pustules, and is a specific in this class of diseases. As physicians have found the carbuncle always dangerous, and almost beyond the reach of remedies, the suggestion may prove of great value to the profession and to sufferers.

Good wheaten bread should be well baked (not burnt), light, and spongy, the crumb being well permeated with little cavities. It should be thoroughly kneaded, of good color (white or brown), not acid to the taste, not bitter, not too moist. When set aside, the lower part should not become sodden. A four-pound loaf loses about one ounce and a quarter in twenty-four hours, about five ounces in forty-eight hours, and about seven ounces in sixty hours. This loss will vary with the temperature, draughts of air, etc.

A cement which is proof against even boiling acids may be made by a composition of India rubber, tallow, lime, and red lead. The India rubber must first be melted by a gentle heat in benzine, and then six to eight per cent. by weight of tallow is added to the mixture while it is kept well stirred; the next day slaked lime is applied, until the fluid mass assumes a consistence similar to that of soft paste; lastly, twenty per cent. of red lead is added, in order to make it harden and dry.

Dr. Cagnoli mentions in the Moniteur Therapeutique that, having as a patient a little boy with rheumatic fever, in whom salicylates produced severe gastric disturbance, he had recourse to compresses saturated with a ten-per-cent. solution of salicylate of soda and covered with oilskin bound round the most acutely inflamed joints. The next day the pain and swelling had disappeared from these and the power of motion had returned to them, while the joints which had not been so treated remained exactly in their previous condition. These latter were afterwards relieved in a similar manner.

If oil has been recently spilled on a carpet or floor, put on plenty of wheat-flour or whiting to absorb the oil as much as possible. If the spot is near a seam, it is well to open the carpet and place the whiting underneath as well. The next day sweep up with a stiff brush the flour above and beneath the carpet, and put on plenty of fresh flour. If spots persist in remaining after this treatment, they can be removed by rubbing with flannel dipped in spirits of turpentine or benzine. Others use a preparation made by mixing a little soap in a gallon of soft warm water, and then adding half an ounce of borax. Wash the part well with a clean cloth, and the spot will soon disappear.

Halle recommends the following application in furunole—Tannic acid, one part; powdered gum-arabic, one part; tincture of arnica flowers, two parts This is to be painted over the boil and for a little distance around it, several coats being applied until it forms a thick and firm covering. Halle states that this mode of treatment quickly relieves the pain and diminishes the swelling. When taken in time, the boil disappears without the formation of pus; and, when this has already occurred, the application causes extrusion of the core and prompt healing of the furuncle.

The prevailing fault of a large proportion of toilet and fancy soaps is that they contain such quantities of "free alkali" as to render them decidedly injurious to tender and sensitive skins when habitually used. Although the general public has not as yet been thoroughly "educated up" to the point of appreciating the magnitude of this evil, yet most persons whose skins are extremely sensitive find by experience, this winter, or during the prevalence of easterly winds, that frequent washing with soap and water is impossible without producing much personal discomfort, unless they use selected kinds of soap to which experience has guided them. Many such persons discard soap altogether in favor of materials like oatmeal and powders which do not contain alkaline matters.

HEALTH.

Concerning Sanitary Science.

"One of the marked changes of our is the altered position of the physician community. The traditional duty of doctor was to cure disease, and supposed to be a sort of malignant which had gotten into the system, and be expelled only by the most energetic heroic remedies. Physicians were said belong to the medical profession, as the business of the doctor was to prescribe doses, which are mostly drugs; while claire wittily summarized the work of physician as an attempt to work a by reconciling intemperance and health half century has altered the whole scope medical study. Sanitary science affects medical theories; and the upshot it all is that the old faith in drugs and doses of all kinds is fast dissolving. are everywhere learning that sunlight, air, good food, proper dress, regular plenty of sleep,—in short, right living, million times better than all the of the world.

"The great physicians of our time vastly more interested in sanitary and hygiene than in therapeutics studying anew the questions perta life. They are investigating the of perfect physical existence. They are ing lectures and writing books on the art of keeping well, of developing force, of building up a perfect body, questions of drainage and ventilation, of nutritive values of the different kinds food, and the proper methods of cooking artificial exercise, when it is necessary to sort to such expedients, the heating and the quantity and fashion of clothes should be worn, are assuming an importance hitherto unknown.

"Everything that relates to the art of living so as to avoid sickness and pain, maintain the highest degree of power enjoyment, is invested with new importance. The physician is no longer a medicine man we send for him when ill, it is true, and ne his curative service as highly as ever; we would pay him a double fee to keep well. He is a member of health police whose function it is to keep people from getting sick, and held a disease at bay. Instead of killing a doctor when a patient dies, after the manner of the Emperor of China, the skill and proficiency of the physician of the future are determined by his success in keeping his patients strong and well; and should they fall ill, he may be dismissed for a better one."

Moral Necessity of Health.

Life is devoted to the pursuit of happiness; and to this, health is obviously indispensable. Usefulness is so essential to happiness that all good and enlightened men teach that the most useful life is the happiest; and health is also obviously indispensable to the greatest usefulness. Health is essential to usefulness; and while purity evidently promotes health, it is equally true, though unfortunately not so evident, that health promotes morality; for the laws of health are the laws of nature's God, obedience to those laws is necessarily morals, and such treatment of the body will in no wise diminish the fullness or force of its vitality; that is, the capacity for fullness is demanded by the highest morality. Health and morality are, then, to a great extent interdependent, each one promoting the other. Knowledge, as well as morality, is essential to usefulness. How dependent knowledge is upon health is made sufficiently obvious by the fact that however great a man's knowledge may be, he, if sick, is less useful and happy than is an ignorant man who is healthy. Thus it seems that knowledge, and morality, and usefulness and happiness the four great objects of life—are all dependent on health.

Let the strong defer to the weak, the wise to the unwise, the skillful to the unskillful, the righteous to the erring, and the roots of equity will be strengthened, and the rich fruits of brotherly love and happiness will abound.

No man can afford to let go of any influence which helps to save him from vulgar and commonplace views of life; from low types of excellence; from the paltry competition which strives above all things after material success; from the dictation of current popular opinion; and the desire to swim with the stream, and spread the sail to the passing breeze.

What greater thing is there for two human souls than to feel that they are joined in life, to strengthen each other in all labor, to rest in each other in all sorrow, to minister to each other in all pain, to be one to each other in silent unspeakable memories at the last parting?

"Pa," asked a little boy, "when a politician goes into office does he have to take an oath?" "Yes." "And when he goes out of office does he take an oath?" "Yes; but there is nothing compulsory about it."

AN EGYPTIAN ROMANCE.

A Story of Love and Wild Adventure, founded upon Startling Revelations in the Career of Arabia Pasha.

By the Author of "NINA, THE NIHILIST," "THE RED SPOT," "THE RUSSIAN SPY," ETC., ETC., ETC.

Return we, almost with the morning's ...ews, to Arabi Pasha's headquarters at the ...ra, so chosen perhaps because the nar... neck of land at that point very nearly ...verted the peninsula on which the Ras-...n palace is built into an island, and so, ... a manner, made him the Khedive's jailer ... the outer gates thereof.

But though the war minister is as yet the ...ter of the situation, his sovereign to all ...rposes and purposes his prisoner, and all ...ypt backing him up and ready to stand ... him, we find him on this especial morn... ...ll at ease and with less confidence than ...al as to the future, for three of his lead... ...generals have disturbed him thus early, ... each had been the bearer of unwelcome ...ings.

Suleman Zoghelb Effendi has brought the ...s that the populace are eager for another ...uropean massacre and that the troops ...n't be relied upon for preventing it.

Salem Pasha, afterward known as "The ...rciful," is bearer of the intelligence that ... immense reward has been offered secret ... by the Khedive for his head, and that ... Sultan of Turkey has veered round again ...der British pressure and is about to dis... ...ch thirty thousand troops to Egypt to ...lp restore the authority of Tewfik.

Toulba Pasha, the last arrival and com...only called "Arabi's Brains," brings the ...formation that the British admiral had ...nt an express to the palace, urging the ...hedive to come off to the fleet, so as to ...ape all dangers from the bombardment ... be intended immediately to open upon ... forts.

This last intelligence seemed to cheer the ...r minister rather than otherwise, for he ...claimed:

"If Tewfik accepts the situation all is ...ell, for by the law of nations, for a sover...gn ruler to seek refuge from his own sub...cts on foreign soil or aboard a foreign ves...l is an act of abdication. The Khedival ...rone will be empty from the moment that ...ewfik plants foot on the deck of an Eng...sh ironclad. I could desire nothing bet...er."

But at this juncture a fourth high official ...ntered the Hall of Councils, and on being ...erily questioned by the war minister as ... what he had to tell, made answer as fol...ows:

"Your excellency, the Khedive has de...ided to quit his palace at the British ...dmiral's invitation, saying he will not de...ert his faithful people merely because he is ...haced by a military insurrection, but ...ill rather cast his lot with them."

"Let not that speech of his get abroad," ...id Arabi, with contracted brows. "It is ...act as a bid for popular favor, nothing ...ore. What other news have you?"

"The English and foreign consular and ...ther authorities are all crowding out of ...he town, early as is the hour, and making ...heir way in boats to the different war ves...els, all of which seem to be getting their ...team up and two or three to be standing ...earer to the shore."

"That looks like business, gentlemen," ...aid Arabi Pasha, with a grim smile.

"If the Feringhee means acts why should ...e be bandying mere words?" growled Su...eiman Effendi, with a hand on his sword ...ilt; whereat the fierce Toulba Pasha ex...laimed: "If Tewfik won't quietly leave the ...and of which he has been the scourge and ...ppressor, why not accord him a grave ...herein and place his Excellency, the Chos...n of the Nation, in his place? What is ...e life when thousands are menaced?"

"Silence!" said Arabi, sternly. "A ...ime such as you hint at, Toulba, never yet ...dvanced the interests of any cause. I put ...y trust in Allah and the strength of a ...od and righteous cause. But I do not in...end to remain idle. My forts are ready, ...y guns are shotted, my artillery men are ...t their posts and ready to shed their blood ...r Egypt's freedom. Yet would I still ...aintain peace if possible, for they who, ...ven of necessity, draw the sword shall per...sh by the sword. Which of you will ven...ure with a verbal message aboard the Brit...sh ship?"

The three pashas and the Effendi all held ...p their hands at once.

But the war minister chose Toulba to be ...is emissary.

CHAPTER XLV.

NELLIE'S FATHER AND MOTHER SET OUT TO DELIVER HER.

Hardly had the war minister finished ...peaking when a captain of artillery enter...d the hall, and advancing, in obedience to ...he usual permission, whispered something ...n Arabi Pasha's ear, the only word audible ...eing the name of Trezarr.

He found Nellie's father and mother anx...iously awaiting him in a room furnished in a ...anner that suggested a compromise be...ween official and private life.

When they had made brief mention of the ...angers which they had encountered on the ...ay they began to make anxious inquiry re...arding their daughter.

"What I have to tell you concerning her ...ust be received in the strictest confidence," ...aid the war minister impressively, "by ...eason that the life of my informant might ...e endangered were it otherwise, for harem ...ecrets are the most dangerous of all secrets ...o be acquainted with, since the betrayal of ...he smallest of them is death, with some...imes the most terrible tortures superadd...d."

Mr. and Mrs. Trezarr were much impress...d by this speech, and whilst its solemnity ...aused them to tremble for their daughter's ...afety, it induced them to promise their ...ord in one breath that they would take his ...dvice and be guided by him in all things.

"It is well," replied Arabi; "know ...hen that our dear Nellie is a prisoner in ...he Khedival seraglio at the Ras-el-Tin ...alace and in the power, moreover, of one ...ho hates her and will sacrifice her to an ...nsane jealousy unless she is prevented."

This explanation by no means tended to ...llay the anxious parents' fears.

"Let me once get hold of my dear child and I'll bring the palace down with my screams but what I'll bring her out," exclaimed Mrs. Trezarr, and she would have gone on in the same strain ad infinitum had not her husband checked her.

Arabi clapped his hands thrice, and the artillery bimbashu appeared.

He called him on one side and gave his directions, and then, turning again towards Mr. and Mrs. Trezarr, said, with a smile:

"That officer is responsible for your safe custody, and in an hour from the present I hope to welcome your return, with your daughter and my affianced wife accompanying you."

With these words he waved his hand, as though deprecating reply and in haste that they should be gone.

No sooner had they passed out of the room, however, than a sudden thought, or rather suspicion, seemed to strike him, and giving utterance to what, sounded very like a muttered Oriental oath, he rushed after them, and catching Mr. Trezarr by his sleeve drew him back a few paces, and said in a half earnest and half jocular tone, but the former predominating:

"Mind that you all three do come back to me. Don't be going aboard one of the British war ships along with the Khedive, for as surely as that your daughter shall be a sovereign princess and the most exalted of all women in Egypt if you keep your word and marry her unto me, so surely will I seize upon all the wealth in your bank and mansion at Cairo, of which I hold the keys, and confiscate all that you possess for the national cause, should you be induced on any pretext to break your word to me."

He waited not for an answer, but hurried back into the room which he had just quitted, where he seated himself cross-legged on a divan, and calling a young Nubian slave to light his chibouque, indulged in the following comforting reflections:

"Trezarr will not now dare to play me false, for his wealth is as dear to him as his very soul, and I can seize upon it at any moment should he venture to leave the country. Then, as to the Khedive, the very thing that I want is to frighten him off Egyptian soil, for I would sooner that his blood was not on my hands, and yet have I every desire that his throne should be left empty, for until empty how can another fill it?"

CHAPTER XLVI.

ELMARR SEIZES THE AMULET AND NELLIE CATCHES THE WHIP.

When we so abruptly left Nellie in the middle of a former chapter, lying half naked amidst the pile of soft and yielding cushions in the almost stifling heat of her prison chamber, we merely said that she slumbered until morning's dawn. She then awoke to find herself bathed in a gentle perspiration, and the pink splotches that the princess' clenched fists had raised on her beginning to turn to bruises.

With a shudder she began to redon her apparel.

Hardly had she completed her toilet when the door of the room was opened and Elmarr came in, bearing on a tray a cup of coffee and some little cakes.

She placed them on the floor, regarded Nellie with an evil leer and was about to withdraw, when our heroine asked her for the necessary requisites for the performing of her ablutions and dressing her hair, whereupon Elmarr grinned and said:

"Her highness, when she has risen, intends to conduct you to the bath and personally to wait upon you there. I am sure that you should feel grateful for such an excess of consideration."

Nellie stammered something or other by way of acknowledgment, but did not feel grateful, for it occurred to her like a conviction that in the bath her loveliness would bring upon her fresh persecutions and sufferings, and that the princess intendnd to wait upon her for no other purpose than to inflict them, and fiercely gloat over her writhings, her pantings and her struggles the while.

The buffoon read her thoughts in the wild, frightened look of the great violet eyes. She went out of the room and closed the door behind her, whereupon Nellie, feeling faint, drew forth a quaint little silver vinaigrette (a luxury which she always carried about her in that climate of intense heat and numerous evil and unwholesome smells), and applying it to her delicate nostrils inhalled the refreshing essence, hoping that it would do her good.

But the buffoon, who had crouched down outside the door to watch the Feringhee girl through the keyhole, no sooner beheld the pretty and somewhat curiously shaped ornament in the captive's fingers and the use to which it was being applied than it entered into her head that it must be the amulet by means of which she had summened the devil to her assistance the night before. With a yell, therefore, she suddenly threw open the door again and with glaring eyes and crooked talons rushed to the attack, Nellie, not at all comprehending the meaning of this hostile demonstration, springing to her feet and trembling all over like an aspen.

When, however, she discovered what the hideous wretch wanted of her, she struggled hard to retain possession of the vinaigrette, for it was dear to her as having been a birthday present from her mother, that mother whom she thought she might never see again.

But the fight that she waged to maintain it convinced Elmarr more than ever that it was that which she suspected it to be, so she clutched the wrist and bit at the hand that held it and at last, succeeded in getting it away from its owner, when she immediately rushed from the room, mingling peals of mocking laughter with shrill and excited exclamations of triumph.

When the wretch had again closed and secured the door again behind her Nellie began to wonder how the foul hag could feel so elated over such a trivial thing, for that the woman imagined it to be anything more than a silver ornament never struck her for an instant.

Feeling slightly hungry and intensely thirsty, for the wants of our fallen nature will assert themselves in the most unfortunate and the most beautiful, Nellie now turned to her cakes and coffee, and after eating a couple of the former she drank a cup of the latter.

No sooner had she swallowed it down, however, than a strange, burning taste came into her mouth, and she grew conscious that her thirst had been increased instead of lessened, and increased to a most painful degree in addition.

So this was a fresh torture that had been devised for her, and as she remembered having read or been told how that prisoners had been tormented unto madness by thirst, she shuddered, for the thought that perhaps they meant to give her nothing to drink but this drugged coffee, and so to render her in time a raving maniac.

To overcome such thoughts, or at all events in order to try to overcome them, she went over to the window, and through the strong bars of her cage gazed for hours upon the fair world outside.

An interruption came in a most marvellous form, that is to say, in the shape of the Princess Zeeneh, carrying in her hand a whip and followed closely by Elmarr the buffoon; having a closely stoppered glass jar under each arm.

As she placed these on the floor our lovely heroine perceived that one was half full of scorpions and the other of centipedes, the two most revolting, repellant and deadly of Egyptian reptiles.

She would have shrieked at the sight, for she felt that they were intended for her and knew not that, save by their dreadful tickling as they crawled over her, and perhaps fought each other upon her, they were innocuous by reason of their stings and poison bags having been drawn from them.

But after Elmarr had put down the two jars she disappeared again and then a second time returned bearing a basin, a jug of water, soft towels, perfumed soap and delicate flesh gloves, whereupon the princess observed with an evil smile:

"The white rose of the Feringhees will have to perform her ablutions in her own room on this occasion, for the bath has been monopolized by my brother's wives and favorites. I myself, however, will be her attendant, assisted by the good Elmarr."

"Oh, you mean to hurt me," sobbed Nellie. "What have you get that whip for if it isn't to beat me with? You shall lash me with my clothes on if you do it at all, and I will struggle to the death before you shall set those terrible reptiles to bite and sting me."

Having said this much she essayed to smash the glass of the window, fancying that could she but succeed she might be able to make her shrieks audible to some of the people who were in the boats, but, as though divining her intentions, the buffoon, who was as strong as any man, sprang upon her, forced her away and sent her reeling across the floor.

"Strip!" exclaimed the princess, fiercely cracking her whip. "Off with everything that you have on—everything, I say. Ah, you have lost your talisman, your amulet, haven't you, you white witch? The devil can't save you from us now. That is why you tremble so, I suppose."

Nellie could not understand what she meant, but cried, nevertheless, for mercy.

But "Strip! Strip!" was all that the princess could utter in reply.

But, as though Nellie read her every thought, and her intoxicating aspiration as well, she would not commence to disrobe, so that at an imperious command from the princess the buffoon flew upon her again and began to tear off her clothing, Nellie at first resisting, but soon discovering how futile it was to do so against the superior strength that was opposed to her, suffering her arms to fall limply by her side and remaining as passive as though she had been a lay figure in the hands of her assailant.

Off came her dress, then the Princess sprang forward, whip in hand, and slashed, slashed, slashed, slashed, with all her strength and fury, at all that warm palpitating and snowy loveliness, the cruel thong licking around back and arms and bosom, and eliciting from the beautiful sufferer shriek after shriek of anguish.

Heaven alone knows what she might have been called upon to suffer ere it was over had not Elmarr suddenly exclaimed, in accents of mingled horror and alarm:

"Your highness, there is a man coming this way. Maloom, Maloom, I forgot to put your shoes outside the curtain. Oh, what's to be done? What's to be done?"

CHAPTER XLVII.

SHOWS WHAT RESULTED FROM A FORGOTTEN PAIR OF SHOES.

There was nothing to be done, simply because it was too late to do anything.

The heavy footsteps had already reached the centre one of the three rooms, and now a shrill female voice was heard exclaiming in not very excellent French:

"Those are my child's screams! They are torturing her! They are surely killing her!"

There was a single word in response, and the princess, dropping her whip, exclaimed:

"It is my brother, the Khedive! Oh, I am lost! I am lost! What shall I say or do?"

Then in an instant her face changed its expression, and seizing hold of Nellie by one of her snowy shoulders, she hissed in her ear, whilst her brilliant eyes seemed to emit rays of light:

"Now it is your turn to have vengeance upon me. My life is in your hands and you know it. The secret of the opal ring and the lotus flower will destroy me. Well, be it so. I would sooner enjoy another buffet at you than cringe to you for pity."

She smote her with both clenched fists at once and as hard as she could strike, and as Nellie staggered backward with a gasp and a half choking sob, she herself turned sharp round with quivering nostrils, compressed lips and flashing eyes, looking like a superb Cleopatra defying her Roman conquerors, to face those that were coming to disturb her at her inhuman sport, while Elmarr, the buffoon, flew to the other end of the room, and crouching down hid herself behind a pile of cushions.

The next instant, or rather that very instant, the door was dashed open, and in the aperture Prince Tewfik, the Khedive, came to a full stop, whilst Mrs. Trezarr, rushing in, was met by Nellie half way, who, with a paroxysm of sobbing, threw herself into the maternal arms, which, as well as the maternal cloak, was thrown around her.

"What is the meaning of this scene?" demanded the Khedive, furiously, of his sister.

"You had better ask her. You don't expect me to criminate myself, and I am far too proud to excuse or to attempt to excuse myself, even to you," was the disdainful answer.

The princess knew that did her smarting victim tell the story of the lotus flower and of the opal ring as she had related it to her only the preceding day, her doom would be death for having received one of the male sex within the seraglio walls, and how could she hope that she would not tell it after such barbaric treatment as she had just received at her hands?

What was her astonishment when she heard the Feringhee girl exclaim:

"Oh, your highness, I don't wish to say anything. I won't say anything. I have no malice. I only want to forgive the princess and to go away with my mother, that is all."

Her highness gave a great gasp as of relief, but said no word of thanks, and the proud, defiant look still remained on her countenance.

Indeed the Khedive looked the most relieved of the two, for he would undoubtedly have executed justice upon his sister according to strict Moslem law, he yet seemed to feel very glad that Nellie had saved him the necessity of doing so.

A quarter of an hour later Nellie quitted the Ras-el-Tin palace between her father and mother and surrounded by the armed guards of the war minister, but Prince Tewfik, the Khedive, quitted it not, for despite all the representations and revelations that Mr. Trezarr had made to him concerning his immediate seizure, trial and execution for treason to the state if he remained on Egyptian soil, on Egyptian soil he was determined to remain notwithstanding.

Nellie and her rescuers had hardly got outside the palace gates when she inquired with some curiosity whither they were about to take her, and not being satisfied with such vague answers as "To a place of safety, my dear," and so on, she plied the question again and again until Mr. Trezarr was driven at last to exclaim:

"We are going to his excellency, the war-minister's, my love. His is the only roof in all Egypt beneath which there is no danger."

"Oh, mamma, I would rather die than marry the war minister. I will never be the wife of a Moslem—of a man who has another wife already. And, besides, you cannot, you will not, you dare not force me to marry any one when I have not been a widow for as much as twenty-four hours," and here a flood of tears came to her relief.

"A widow? The child has taken leave of her senses," gasped Mr. Trezarr.

"No, I have not I wish to heaven that I had," wailed out Nellie. "I was married to poor Frank in the Catholic church here yesterday morning, only a couple of hours before he was killed by the mob whilst we were on our way to the harbor."

It will be remembered that Arabi Pasha had told the Trezarrs nothing at all of this, as he had not the slightest desire that Nellie should know that her Christian husband still lived, for he trusted that her grief, her despair and that state of bodily and mental prostration in which the victim can hardly be said to care what happens to her would cause the lovely girl to obey her parent's wishes in all things.

Those parents, however, were perfectly bothered and bewildered at what their child had just told them, though it was not long before Mr. Trezarr thought he saw a way out of the scrape.

"Oh, a Popish ceremony is nothing," said he. "You were brought up a Protestant, Nell, and a Romanish marriage is, of course, no more binding on your conscience than jumping over a broomstick would be. Besides, the—the poor fellow is dead—was killed two hours after you were—were imposed upon by a lot of nonsense. Of course, I'm sorry for him, very; but for all that, you are as much Miss Trezarr and as little Mrs. Donelly as ever you were."

"I am so much Mrs. Donelly, papa, that I shall retain the name all my life through, and I, myself, chose the service of the Catholic church because I esteemed it the most holy, solemn, binding and God blessed of all marriage services," replied our heroine firmly.

What answer Mr. Trezarr would have made to such a terrible speech as this, had he been able to make any reply at all, it is hard to tell, but as it was he opened his mouth to let a stone in instead of wisdom out—a stone that caused him to swallow two of his teeth and a great deal of blood from a cut lip as well.

This missile proved to be the advance guard of many such, and from that point all the way to the arsenal the crowd strove its utmost to get at the European whom the soldiery were guarding.

At last, however, the arsenal gates were reached and opened and the Trezarrs and their escort gained the haven of shelter, though followed by a perfect rain of missiles from behind the hastily reclosed barriers.

Religion in a Pack of Cards.

A sergeant in an English company one Sunday, marched his soldiers to church and commanding them to take out their Bibles or prayer books; each did so, except one soldier by the name of Richard Lee, who took out a pack of cards, and spread them before him. The sergeant said: "Richard, put up that pack of cards." The soldier said: "I shall not do so." The sergeant said: "If you will not do so I shall arrest you after the service is over." When the service was over he brought the soldier before his lordship, the Mayor of Glasgow, who asked the sergeant, "Why dost thou bring this soldier here before me?" "For playing cards in church, your worship." His lordship says, "Soldier, what hast thou to say for thyself?" "Much do I pray your lordship to hear me." "It is well, if you do not well excuse yourself I will punish you severely. Go on and explain." The soldier said, "Your lordship, I have been six weeks upon the march and I had neither Bible or prayer book, nor almanac. I shall attempt to convince your lordship that this pack of cards has served me for all these." "Go on," said his lordship. "When I look upon the ace it reminds me that there is but one God; when I look upon the deuce it reminds me of the Father and Son. And when I look upon the tray it reminds me of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. When I look upon the four it reminds me of the four evangelists that preached, Mathew, Mark, Luke and John. When I look upon the five it reminds me of the five wise virgins; there were ten, but five were foolish and were shut out. When I look upon the six it reminds me that in six days God created the heavens and earth. When I look upon the seven it reminds me that upon the seventh day He rested and hallowed his work. When I look on the eight it reminds me of the eight righteous persons who were saved in Noah's ark, namely, Noah, his wife, his three sons and their wives. When I look upon the nine it reminds me of the lepers that were cleansed before our Lord. And when I look upon the ten it reminds me of the Ten commandments which God handed down to Moses, upon tablets of stone at Mt. Sinai." The soldier then laid aside the knave. "When I look upon the Queen it reminds me of that great and good Queen the Queen of Sheba, who was as wise a woman as Solomon was a man; she brought fifty boys and fifty girls all dressed in boy's apparel before King Solomen for him to tell who were the boys and who were the girls. King Solomen ordered water to be brought before him for them to wash; the boys washed to their wrists and the girls to their elbows, so that he told by that. When I look upon the King it reminds me of the great King in heaven, who is God Almighty." His lordship said: "Soldier, thou has well explained every card except the knave." The soldier said: "If your lordship will not get angry." His lordship says: "I will not get angry, provided you do not term me to be the knave." "No," says the soldier, "the greatest knave that I know of is the sergeant who brought me before you. When I count the pack of cards I find there are 52, which is emblematical of the weeks of the year. When I count the suites I find there are four, which is emblematical of the seasons of the year. When I count the tricks I find there are thirteen, which is emblematical of the weeks in each quarter. When I count the spots I find there are 365, which is emblematical of the days of the year. So, you will observe, your lordship, that this pack of cards has answered me as a Bible and prayer book and almanac." His lordship says, "Richard, you are discharged."

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

We never do ourselves as much good as when we are, at least, trying to do good to others.

Self-denial and thought for the happiness of others are among the seeds from which shall spring never-fading flowers.

Like a dream is the life of man; like swift ships, seen for a moment on the horizon's edge and then sailing we know not whither.

There is nothing makes a man suspect much, more than to know little; and, therefore, men should remedy suspicion by procuring to know more, and not to keep their suspicions in smother.

The pleasures of the world are deceitful; they promise more than they give They trouble us in seeking them, they do not satisfy us when possessing them, and they make us despair in losing them.

Helen Jackson never wrote truer words than these, which were penned about one year ago: "It is a piteous thing to see how, in this life, the gentler and finer organized nature is always the one to suffer most, and come off vanquished in collisions, and the coarse grained, brutal one to triumph."

The bad men in society are always ready for rebellion. The bad element in politics is always treasonable in its nature. When treason raises its bloody hand, every good man and true is in honor bound to enlist for the war in defense of virtue, integrity and allegiance to the best interests of mankind.

Only he who puts on the garment of humility finds how worthily it clothes his life. Only he who dedicates himself to the spiritual service of his brethren, simply because his Master tells him they are worthy of it, comes to know how rich those natures of his brethren are, how richly they are worth the total giving of himself to them.

That man has learned a great lesson who has learned to accept himself as he is given to himself. We may build a thousand airy castles as to what we would do if we had the genius of a Milton or of a Newton; but nothing will ever come of such airy castle-building. The real question that should interest us is, What work can we best do, without the genius of Milton or Newton, but with ourselves as we are. When we answer that question, we stand at the threshhold of the door that leads to the highest success of which we are capable.

Capturing a Bear.

One day lately a Manners Sutton, bear-hunter, went out in pursuit of his sport. He came upon a track near Nutter's some distance to the south of York Mills, following which for about one mile a bear was discovered in his lair. The only weapon the man was provided with was his axe with which he struck brain a blow. The beast got mad at this and showed fight. The hunter thinking discretion the better part of valor retreated as fast as possible. The bear soon overreached him, however, and got his paw on the snowshoes. There was a flounder in the snow and a fight at close quarters. After a while our hero got on his feet again and made for a tree, which he managed to climb, not much the worse for the encounter. The bear, however, had got badly hurt; yet, not content with tearing the man, made efforts to get up, too, but found himself too weak for the operation. He solaced himself for about half an hour by acting the part of a belligerent, then started to go away. The man came down and followed; there was another encounter at close quarters, when, with a well directed blow of the axe, the bear was stretched out to be numbered with the slain. The carcass was found to weigh 315 lbs., sold next day for $20 and has since been shipped to Boston.

MARKDALE APRIL 1, 1886

FAREWELL BANQUET.

On Friday evening last about forty representative citizens of our village met at the Markdale House to do honor to Mr. Shanahan on the occasion of his removal from this place to Penetang. After partaking of the good things provided in the usual toothsome manner by Mrs. Marsh. G. S. Bowes, Esq., was called to the chair, and the usual tosts were drank in cold water, and responded to in quick succession. Every one present was given an opportunity to give vent to his oratorical abilities or musical talent, and a very pleasant and sociable time was spent. Mr. Shanahan, the guest, was the recipient of numerous warm ulogies as a citizen and business man, and general deep regret was expressed at loosing such a desirable resident.

The guest expressed his strong attachment to the people of Markdale both as to business relations and social ties. The party broke up in good time and highly pleased with the social gathering.

THE RIEL DEBATE.

This question has been one of more than ordinary interest to the whole Dominion, and the prolonged debate was watched with profound attention by all classes. It has come to a close however, and the most sanguine supporters of the Government were surprised at the result; not because they were sustained, but at the immense majority, 94 out of a vote of 198 the division stood 52 for Landry's motion and 146 against.

The vote in Provinces stood as follows:

	For the Motion.	Against it.
Ontario.....	18	65
Quebec	28	36
New Brunswick	1	14
Nova Scotia....	4	17
P. E. Island....	1	4

Markdale lodge of Canadian Order of Odd Fellows has a large membership and is in a very prosperous condition. Every man in town should be a member, as it is not only a mutual benefit, but in case of sickness it is very convenient to have ones board and doctor bill paid, while it only costs $7 a year to be a member.

Last Monday evening was election of officers, and an interesting and very exciting election it was.

SLOPED OFF.

Our citizens have been kept in a state of unrest the past week owing to the sudden and unexpected departure of a few defaulters. It's only a short time since Jesse Wing of Euphrasia disappeared suddenly leaving many sorrowing neighbors who had favored him with various amounts, but who were left to mourn over a hopeless case. They had scarcely laid off mourning when Pat Welsh of Glenelg (thinking he was doing something smart) made arrangements to leave by the Durham railway, in order to make shure his secret departure, but the secret got out and a number who he was indebted to gave him a surprise at the station in Durham, and Pat had to disgorge to the general satisfaction of his creditors. The next thing we are startled by the rumor that young Jonnie Noble had skipped. This was a mourufal surprise to very many in town. Jonnie has been an industrious welldoing young man, but owing to an accident which happened him last summer in which he was laid up the greater part of the year, he fell behind, and of course very naturally drew largely on the sympathies of the people, owing to former good habits and above accident, so that he had "got into" mostly all our business men more or less to the tune of some $600 or $700. Nothing has been heard from him except a flying report that he was married in Toronto to one Mary McCormick of Glenelg.

The next on the list was Alick Nester, our young butcher. He made good his escape, but his indebtedness was trifling—and now the question is asked who'll be next.

Imported Stallion.

We are pleased to note that Messrs. Trimble & Pickell have purchased the important Clydesdale Stallion "Lord Derby" for which they have paid the handsome some of $2,200. This animal is without doubt one of the best of this class of horses ever imported into Canada, he has lots of bone and hair and very superior style and action, and is acknowledged by all the leading importers to be the best Sire Horse in Canada to day—which fact is proved by the great number of prize winners got by him which have carried off first prizes at our Provincial Industrial, and other leading fairs in the county. Markdale and vicinity are fortunate in having men of Messrs. Trimble & Pickell's enterprise who risk so much to bring in for breeding purposes such valuable stock, such enterprise on the part of those gentlemen should (and we believe will) be rewarded by a liberal support from the farmers of this country, any person visiting Markdale should see this horse, Mr. Trimble will be pleased to show him and give all necessary information.

Resolutions of the Town Council of Listowel.

Moved by Robert Woods seconded by Samuel Bricker and resolved:—That this Council desire to express their great pleasure at the extraordinary energy with which the Directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway have pushed on to completion their Main Line from Ocean to Ocean, and at the extensive accommodation already given to settlers for Manitoba and the North-West Territories by the construction of branch lines. We also have much pleasure in acknowledging the courtesies of Mr. E. A. Bailey, Emigration Commissioner for Manitoba, both for the opportunity of examining the products collected in the C. P. R. exhibit car, and for the valuable information furnished the Council by that Gentleman.

Moved by Thos. E. Hay, Esq., Reeve, seconded by R. Martin, Esq., Deputy Reeve, and resolved:—That the Council of the Town of Listowel in Council assembled, having heard a representive member of the Farmers' Union of Manitoba on the various questions in connection with the agriculture in the Province, do freely recommend to all seeking homes in the west to go to Manitoba and the North West Territories in preference to Dakota or any of the Western States, believing that portion of the Dominion of Canada offers greater advantages to settlers, especially in agriculture and stock raising.

Passed in Council this 10th March, 1886.

Mysterious Burning to Death of a Farmer and Hired Man Near Wiarton.

Wiarton, Ont., March 26.—A fire took place about three miles from here at 8 o'clock last night in a house occupied by Wm. Bailey, a farmer, in which he and his hired man, name unknown, were burned to death. The flames were first seen by the nearest neighbor, who lives ten rods distant, but the fire was so far advanced when he got there that no chance of entering the building was possible. The outside doors were found locked. Mr. Bailey's horses were found in the stable still harnessed as he had just returned from here. The matter is shrouded in mystery. An inquest will be held.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Afflictions, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Dability and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. Noyes, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, N. Y.

Correspondence.

Notice.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsib'e for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

Maxwell.

From our own correspondent.

Maxwell news is somewhat scarce
And has been for some time,
But never mind we'll do our best
To make a little rhyme.

Several weeks have passed away,
And nothing has been seen
In reference to our little town
Phiz, so quietly has been.

Bridget says why don't you write
And not act no the clown
And let the general public know
What's going on in town.

So down I sit with pen in hand
My thinking cap it's on,
And I may say that Mrs. Potts
Has come to live in town.

On the night of the thirteenth inst.
About half past ten o'clock,
A fire broke out in the parsonage here
But soon the flames were stopped.

The inmates they had all retired,
And were all sound asleep
Until the call of fire awoke
Them from their slumbers deep.

The cause is yet unknown to me
And I may say to all
It broke out in the woodssed
Where there was no pipes at all.

Messrs. W. G. & J. Bleakley,
Have bought land each out here,
And lately thay have moved thereon
Their rough farms for to clear.

I understand they're keeping bach,
Poor business I would think
But if I'm not mistaken
They soon will need the link.

I think I've given all the news
Ot any account this week,
So farewell Mr. Editor
I now lie down to sleep.

The Only Way to Avert a Great Evil.

To the Editor of the Standard.

Sir.—It is not difficult to foresee that with our cold, damp weather, and even in spring and fall, this will be a very disagreeable country to live in as soon as the remains of our forests, which intersperse the country, are cut or fall down. It would be an excellent thing no doubt, if owners would preserve many of these, but that does not seem probable owing to the habit of letting cattle run at large in the remaining woods. People do not know how injurious this is. I remember a good many years ago clearing a farm and leaving a good ten or fifteen acres on the north side to shelter it. This was a long narrew piece. and a beautiful mass of green leaves, the chief trees being maple, oak and hemlock in good growth, and the ground in good forest condition, covered deep with old leaves—there should be no grass in a wood—and well filled with fine young saplings ready to replace the older trees. Now, if I had fenced this it would have remained good, for there was too much young green hardwood for it to catch fire, if any had run there, exeept on the outside edge. But it remained unfenced, cattle got in, eat down all the young trees, dried and hardened it all, grass got in, and it was in a few years all cut down, not then resembling the original bush at all, but a wilderness of dry stalks.

But if the old forest can in no great portion be preserved, if people will spend $50 worth of shelter to grow a dollar's worth of beef, as previously remarked, this will be a miserable land to either live or travel in. Farms cannot bear the class of cold—the damp cold—prevalent in Ontario without shelter, as people can where the cold is drier. Ontario was formerly heavily covered with forest, and her climate needs something of the sort.

What I should like to suggest would be, that if owners of land would invest to some extent in planting rows of evergreens across the north and west sides of their land the evil would be to a great extent averted. They are doing this in many parts of the states where every year millions of young evergreens are sold by leading nursery men. They are then sent great distances by being sold when small, 4 to 6 inches $3 50 per thousand, 10 to 12 inches $8 per thousand, 18 to 20 inches $12 per hundred. This is norway spruce, pines and cedars are rather more. I have no doubt that, as soon as there is a demand for them, they can be procured as cheaply in Ontario, perhaps can now. Or, with care, any one can grow seedlings for themselves, but time is lost. Then there are many thousands yet to be had for nothing in woods and fields. In transplanting there is one thing to be remembered, never let the roots of evergreens dry for a moment, Keep them damp and covered from sun and wind till the time they are planted, The best time is the first week in June, but I have known great numbers planted with great success in early spring, while the ground was a little refrozen, so that some earth was carried with the roots.

A fortnight's labour, in planting out young evergreens, say this year, and some care given afterwards to preserve them, would give in a few years a beautiful vale of closely growing trees, the greatest ornament and most valuable protection a farm can have.

Yours etc.,

R. W. Phipps.

THE FARM

Large Crops from Cut Potatoes.

A successful cultivator of potatoes says: When the Early Rose was first brought out I planted 5 lb, which cost $5. They were cut to single eyes and each placed 3 ft. apart, making 47 hills, and the produce was 831 lbs. or 5½ bushels; at the rate of 550 bushels per acre in round numbers. The next year I planted a quarter of an acre, using about half the previous crop, cut to single eyes and two sets in a hill. The 1,200 hills gave 125 bushels, not counting a few bushels dug early in July. One acre of Harisons the same year planted in the same manner gave me 660 measured and counted bushels. The next spring every Early Rose used in the house was peeled thickly and the eyes kept for planting. These thin sets gave fully as large a yield as those bulky ones cut from the large tubers. I have planted similarly cut sets in boxes in the greenhouse for transplanting later into the garden, and the yield was as good as that of the ordinary crop from large cuttings.

The largest yields of potatoes ever grown were produced from rooted cuttings of the stem of the young plant which had no portion of the tuber to draw nutriment from. Last year I took from six to eight sprouts from each bud of a sweet potato and these planted out in the field grew vigorously and yielded over 800 bushels per acre, some of the tubers weighing eight pounds, and the average of the crop being four and three-quarter pounds. Sweet potatoes are all grown in this way: the sprouts being pulled from the seed and this is left to throw out more sprouts. Is it reasonable that the common potato differs wholly from every other growth? And are we now to cast aside the results of thirty years' practice and experience for a new way which is opposed to all this gathered knowledge?

I never found soil too rich for potatoes. I raised a crop equal to 1,200 bushels per acre on an old barnyard; the vines covered the ground in a mat more than knee deep, and the majority of the hills turned out 12 quarts. Last season I saw over 700 bushels of Peerless turned out of a 3 acre plot. Both of these crops were from cuttings of two eyes each and three sets in a hill, which has been as long as I can remember the common way of planting. It is not the cutting of the seed which makes the present small yield but the loss of fertility; the big yields are always upon rich soil. Potato varieties "run out" only by reason of a continued course of poor soil. Two years ago I had 450 bushels per acre of Early Rose, which was very nearly equal to my first crop grown on better soil.

"There is a Wrong."

A level-headed farmer writes as fellows: Farmers do not obtain more than half of the amount the customer pays for meat. The butchers are too greedy, and many of them apparently conscienceless. They are selling cuts now just as high as when live stock cost them from one-third to one-half more. Several butchers offered me for a lot of small but nice lambs from $1 to $1 50 each. I had them butchered and sold the quarters to the village people at nine cents a pound, and they brought me from $2 50 to $3 each and the pelts about 65 cents. The other parts of them paid for all the trouble and time spent.

There should be closer relation between farmers and consumers. It is for the interests of both. I have no objections to the "handlers," but I do most seriously object to their gouging me and robbing the consumer. They should be satisfied with a fair recompense for their labor. The producer is entitled to his share of what consumers are willing to pay. If consumers, who are mainly manufacturers or tradespeople, were not so stupid they might see that the more a farmer can sell at a remunerative price the more means he has to buy their wares with.

The privilege and duty of the consumer is thus plain—to go around the greedy middlemen and put himself to some trouble to encourage the backbone of prosperity in this country, the farmers, to raise good meat and other things and buy direct from them. This sort of trade would revive meat production, now deadened and supplanted by the Western dressed meats; and it would also help dairymen to find some prosperity in their calling. Consumers are paying almost twice as much for good butter as the dairyman gets; and it is an outrage that the retailer or grocer should get nearly as much for mere handling as the maker for all the cost and labor of production.

Preparing for Spring Work.

The comparative idleness of winter makes the horses' shoulders tender, and unless they are hardened, plowing will soon make them sore. The best hardener is strong, pure brine. Apply it with a rag tied around the end of a corn cob. During the work season, soon as the collar is removed, wash the shoulder and apply the salt water. It toughens the flesh, and also cools the shoulder, allaying all irritation and inflammation. Discard all collars much worn, and select new ones now when you have plenty of time. Take the horse to the harness shop; do not buy a collar until you got one that fits well. It is a common fault that one side is harder than the other; be careful to get a collar of equal firmness throughout, and not lumpy, and if it fits perfectly the firmer it is the better. Give all the harness an oiling now, because the oil will be absorbed better than when the weather is warm. Take the harness to pieces and wash it clean with lukewarm water, using a dull knife about the buckles to remove the dirt. Use pure neats foot oil (you will have to pay a good price for it but use no other), with enough castor oil to scent it, and keep the mice away. Apply the oil moderately warm on both sides of the leather, all that is rapidly absorbed. Then hang the harness in an airy place to dry thoroughly. Two oilings a year of harness, except the collars, is enough, but the collars should be oiled every two weeks during the work season, and the sweat and dirt removed each morning with a dull knife. Give the woodwork of the plows a coat of paint. Mineral paint is very cheap and answers this purpose as well as more expensive paints. But use the best oil. If the plows are dull, take them all to the shop now when work is not pressing. Strengthen weak places. Do not wait for breaks, they always occur when the article is in use, hence when they occasion delay. Give the whiffletrees the same attention recommended for the plows. About the easiest way to make a dollar is to take time by the forelock.

A Rural Remonstrance.

Old farmer Wiarow raised his head,
And laid aside his paper;
His spectacles slid down his nose
And rested on its taper.

"Well, I declar'!" he cried aloud;
"This beats the very dickens!
They've gone an' shifted roun' the time,
As sure as chicks is chickens.

"I never heerd, upon my word,
Of anything to beat it,
I s'pose they think them city folks
Hev got their minds unseated.

"An what is this I read in heer?
Great Cæsar! save the clock!
They're goin' to stretch the hours out
To twenty-four o'clock!"

The worthy farmer scratched his ear
In deepest meditation
He gazed perplexed upon the clock
With mental agitation.

"For sixty years I've plowed along
As reg'lar as the sun, sir,
An' used the good, old-fashioned time
Without a hitch, by gum! sir.

"They string my fields with telephones,
Or some new-fangled trashee,
They send out one-wheeled railway trains
To everlastin' smashes,

"An' yet, they be not satisfied
With the customs they hev slander'd,
But they must go an' 'signate
A new an' fresh 'time-standard.'"

"I really shouldn't be surprised,
Nor my old woman, 'ither,
If them thar city lunatics
Should drap time altogether.

"An some fine day, when we arise,
Our daily race to run,
We'll find that while we've bin asleep
They've turned around the sun!

"But really now I didn't think
(Nor my old Sal, I reckons)

A Hopeful Electrical Invention.

It is a remarkable fact that while almost every month new uses are discovered for electricity, yet, as a matter of fact, for sixty years there has been no new means invented to produce the electrical current itself. We have to depend upon the zinc plate immersed in a bath of acid chemicals, or on friction for which a steam-engine must be used. But the destruction of the zinc in the one case, and the use of the steam in the other, involves a waste of power which in all, save a few particulars, makes electricity too costly to use either as an illuminant or a motive power. An electrical light is very powerful, but gas or oil is very much cheaper. A train of cars was run by electricity thirty years ago, and cost four times as much as steam. But now comes to the front Henry B. Ford, who claims to have discovered the secret of the cheap production of electricity. If he has succeeded, it will make the greatest revolution known to the history of industry. This new process discards the steam-engine, zinc, and the acids, and relies upon carbon in its cheapest and most accessible forms. Mr. Ford claims that with distillery slops, the debris of a gas house, the muck from a swamp, he can produce an electric current sufficiently powerful to replace steam and produce light. Common salt or ocean water is all he needs with the carbonized materials, to induce the current. If his invention is what he claims for it, a steamship can go to sea with some waste carbon, one-tenth the volume of the coal which is now indispensable, and a motive can be developed which will cost but a trifle, and yet will be powerful enough to propel the heaviest and largest steamers from continent to continent. If there is anything in this invention, its possibilities are simply incalculable.

Sam Jones on Money.

The Rev. Sam Jones, whatever his other characteristics, has a truly Scriptural regard for money. If he is correctly reported, he says: "I have no use whatever for money; I have all the money I want. My needs are supplied bountifully. My family is comfortable and happy, and I can't see what on earth I would do with money if I had it. A couple of hundred dollars in the bank is an abundance, and is all I have. As long as a man has plenty for his wife and children and himself he ought to be contented. I don't think the Lord sent me out into the world to make money; but He did send me out into the world to do good. As far as my wife is concerned, my life is insured for $12,000, the interest on which, when I am gone, will be enough to keep her; and as for my children, I don't want to leave them $1. If they are of any account they won't need it; if they are no good, money would be a curse to them."

A New and Valuable Oil.

There are now enormous crops of peanuts grown in our Southern States, as well as in Africa and South America. The peanut is relished by many people whose digestion is strong. It makes an economical and fattening food for hogs and cattle, but its chief value now is the oil it produces. Under proper manipulation the nut yields nearly fifty per cent. of a bland, almost colorless fixed oil, not unlike olive oil, and used for similar purposes. It is a non-drying oil, and remains fluid at several degrees below the freezing point of water. Some of our finest and most valuable toilet soaps are made from this oleaginous extract from the peanut.

Smooth.

Bicyclist—"What did you mean by telling me that the road was smooth when it is nothing but a stone quarry down there?"

Pennsylvania farmer—"Rocks in the road? Why, of course there was."

Bicyclist—"Why did you not tell me, then?"

Pennsylvania farmer—"Because you didn't ax me. If you had taken the rocks out of the way, you would have found that the road was smooth."

Bicyclist can't see it.

CAPT. ZANE'S GHOST.

A Thrilling Adventure on Lake Huron.

Capt. Smithers of the bark Windward, relates the following curious adventure which he had on Lake Huron. "We were," he says, "in the Lake Superior ore trade, running out of Cleveland, and on the return trip we generally managed to pick up a light freight of machinery and general cargo. At the time of which I speak I had command of a schooner called the Black Eagle.

"Well, one night late in the summer, the tug had scarcely let go of us at the foot of Lake Huron, when it came on to blow great guns. We got the schooner snug and shipshape for bad weather and let her slip, having the wind from the southeast. This gave us our course up the lake, but within an hour we had everything double-reefed and two men at the wheel. The sea began to get up in a terrible way, and as I stood on the quarter, and looked back at the waves following us with racehorse speed, it seemed as if every one must break over us. It was near midnight, and we were abreast of Lexington or a little above when I suddenly heard a hail from off our starboard bow. Mind you, the whole crew were on deck at this time, and the schooner was climbing up on hill and hill and sliding down another in a way to make you think her bottom had been greased for the occasion. I had two men on the lookout forward, but they had reported nothing.

"'Schooner ahoy!' came from the water.

"I ran forward to the starboard shrouds of the foremast, and peered into the storm and darkness, but could see nothing.

"'Schooner ahoy!' came the hail again. 'Stand by to take my line!'

"Next instant the end of a heaving line flew over my shoulder, and as I pulled in on it, assisted by one of the lookouts, a skiff drew alongside and a man climbed upon the rail. I was that weak in the knees I could hardly stand up. A man coming aboard of us in such a cockle shell in such a sea as that was truly remarkable, and you must add to this the fact that he sat there on the schooner's rail as cool as ice and bawled out to me:

"'Hope I haven't put you to any trouble, Capt. Smithers!'

"'Who are you, and where do you come from?' I shouted in his ear.

"'I'm Capt. Zane of the brig Petrel. Don't know your old friends, eh?'

"That made me jump, and such of the crew as had crowded around us gave him sea room pretty quick. Capt. Zane left Buffalo in the Petrel five years before that, and his craft had gone down in a blow with all hands. I had known him well, and in truth this chap on the rail, now that I came to look closer, was as near like him as a twin brother, except that his hair had grown whiter.

"'You—you can't be Capt. Zane,' I shouted.

"'Oh, I can't, eh?' he replied, and tapered off with a laugh which set my blood to tingling. 'Pretty fairish blow, Capt. Smithers. Maybe you have some good whiskey in the cabin?'

"Like one walking in a dream, I went to the cabin and secured a flask of whiskey and returned with it.

"'Ah, that's more like it,' he chuckled, as he reached out for the flask. 'Here's to a speedy voyage both ways.'

"He put the flask to his lips, and, as I'm a living man, he didn't let go until he had drained the last drop. The crew had all crowded off to be out of his way, and, though I wanted to follow them, my pride held me back. As he handed the flask back, I said to him:

"'I thought the Petrel went down years ago?'

"'Y-e-s!' he chuckled.

"'And Capt. Zane went with her?'

"'Oh! he did? Ha! ha! ha! Say, Smithers, you'd better keep her head up a point more, for the wind's drawing more to the east!'

"He reached out his hand as if to lay it on my shoulder, and I started back. At that instant there came a flash of lightning so bright that I could have told the color of a man's hair 200 feet away—a report as if a dozen cannon had been fired at once—and I felt myself struck down. When I came to, the cook was fussing over me, and the rest of the crew were sitting about in a dazed way or had crept down into the fo'castle. Morning was just breaking, and, though the wind had gone down some, there was a heavy sea running and the schooner was head to it, wheel lashed, and drifting with dry decks. It was a long time before I could comprehend what had happened or get at the facts. It seemed that the cap on the mainmast had been struck by lightning. While little injury had been done, the shock had knocked everybody except the cook senseless. Some of the men recovered after a quarter of an hour, and some remained as if dead for nearly two hours. I was one of the last ones up.

"Now as to what happened after I went down I give you the word of the cook, who was a respectable colored man and not given to lying. Capt. Zane jumped down off the rail, let go throat and peak halyards all around, and while he went aloft to stow fore and main topsails the schooner steered herself. When he came down he took the wheel, held the craft up until the jib was full, and then brought her about with her nose to the wind without shipping a pail of water. Then he pulled and trimmed, hauled the mainsail up a bit to counterbalance, and when the wheel had been lashed amidships the Black Eagle bowed and nodded and drove off before the gale in shipshape fashion. When I got my bearings Port Austin light was less than five miles away, and the wind had gone down so that we had little trouble to bring the schooner back on her course. As soon as we reached Houghton every blessed man of the crew, mate and cook included, gave me the slip. Money couldn't have hired one of them to make another voyage in the Black Eagle while I was in command, believing as they did, that my old friend was likely to come aboard again any time."

An exchange asks how to prevent older from working. We would suggest that it be placed on the detective force to look up the recent robberies in this vicinity.

Sir Andrew Clarke, the celebrated English physician, at an inaugural meeting of a course of lectures in London, defined health as "that state in which the body is not conciously present to us, the state in which work is easy and duty not over great a trial, the state in which it is a joy to see, to think, to feel, and to be." Such a condition, Sir Andrew thinks, is not common among men, and, judged by this rule, he declares that one-half the population of London is permanently ill.

Sarah Bernhardt has thrown up her part in "Marion Delorme" in order to devote herself to the study of the role of Ophelia for the forthcoming representation of "Hamlet" at the Porte St. Martin. It was with some reluctance that she undertook the part, she says, fearing that she was hardly youthful enough to do thorough justice to Shakespear's heroine. However, she reflected that she was only about the same age as Miss Terry, and her scruples gave way.

The Island of Juan Fernandez, upon which Alexander Selkirk, the prototype of Robinson Crusoe, spent his four solitary years, has never since been inhabited until twelve years ago, when the present Governor Redt settled upon it with a small colony. Redt is a Switzer. In 1866 he fought for Austria against the Prussians, and in 1870 for France. After the defeat of the French he emigrated to Chili and made himself useful to the Government, at whose invitation he undertook the colonization of Robinson Crusoe's lonely island. Here he has resided for the last twelve years as Governor and Judge. Most of the settlers over whom he presides are German and Swiss. Nearly all the vegetation of the temperate zone thrives upon Juan Fernandez.

An Asiatic mob, according to a recent writer, differs from the ordinary one. All over Asia from Constantinople to Shanghai, vast mobs continually assemble for worship, for jollification, for curiosity, and nobody interferes. In India, Burmah, Ceylon, Arabia, and China immense crowds continually assemble without disturbance of any kind, without endangering public peace and [illegible] when, owing to the breath of some devasting epidemic [illegible] generated. A Significant Story.

A wealthy banker in one of our [illegible] cities, who is noted for his large [illegible] tions to charities, and for his kindly [illegible] of private benevolence, was called on by [illegible] pastor one evening and asked to go with [illegible] to the help of a man who had attempted [illegible] commit suicide.

They found the man in a wretched [illegible] in an alley, not far from the banker's [illegible] ing. The front room was a cobler's shop; [illegible] hind it, on a miserable bed, in the kitchen, [illegible] lay the poor shoemaker, with a gaping [illegible] in his throat, while his wife and children [illegible] were gathered about him.

"We had been without food for [illegible] said the woman, when he returned. "It [illegible] not my husband's fault. He is a hard-working, sober man. My husband was [illegible] from fasting, and seeing us starving [illegible] him mad. So it ended that way," [illegible] to the fainting, motionless figure on the [illegible] bed.

The banker, having fed and warmed the family, hurried home, opened his desk, took out a file of little bills. All his debts were promptly met, but he was [illegible] to be careless about the account of [illegible] bread, etc., because they were so [illegible]

He found there a bill of Michael Goodlew was the suicide. It was the [illegible] for repairing children's shoes, $10. [illegible] er's unpaid debt which had brought [illegible] people to the verge of the grave, and [illegible] en this man to desperation, while, at the very same time, the banker had given away thousands in charity.

The cobbler recovered, and will never want a friend while the banker lives and will a small unpaid bill ever again be found on the banker's table.

No man has a right to be generous with his debts are paid; and the most effective use of money is not alone in alms-giving but to pay liberally and promptly the people whom we employ.

The more we do for God, the more we are indebted to him; for our sufficiency is in him and not of ourselves.

"Halloa! halloa! What's all this?" said the old gentleman, astounded by the sight.

"Why, father, its Rory, my Rory McDonald."

"Yes, Jessie," said Rory, "yours always, and—" (grand tableau).

And so it was. Jessie and Rory were again together after their long and anxious waiting. Rory had no occasion to shoulder his musket again, for before he got convalescent the cruel war was over, and he carried the now blooming Jessie down to his home in Glengarry, her father "thereto consenting." Indeed he went with them, and shortly after their arrival a wedding took place, the like of which never was known to the oldest inhabitant, and great and uproarious were the rejoicings thereat, as the wild Highlandmen, a good many of them Rory's erstwhile comrades, formed a ring, and while the pipers made the adjoining country for mil s around resound, they danced while they sang:

"Hey! for Ronald McDonald!
Hey for a bottle of beer!
Hey! for Ronald McDonald!
And hey for a bottle of beer."

[THE END]

The Use of Opium by Women.

A New York paper says: Women are more largely addicted to the use of opium then men are. This is true in the country as well as in the city. I have inquired of the apothecary on this subject, and he has told me that he keeps opium ready in little packets for his women customers, who take it "on the sly." They use it for the same reason that poor men get drunk on spirituous liquors. Trouble, care, the burdens of a hard lot in life lead or drive to drink; it first gives them a pleasing exhilaration, and then it drowns their thoughts in the stupor of intoxication. Women have their full share of the troubles of life. Some years ago I saw the report of an asylum for the deranged which gave the occupations of the patients in confinement. More of them were farmer's wives than any other one class of persons. They were young wives too. Burdened with the cares of the household, keeping no hired help, anxious and ambitious, they succumbed to the load. Before losing their reason how much suffering they must have endured! Poor, weak, tired, working when hardly able to drag themselves about, complaining of a sense of goneness that words will not describe they sink beneath the weight and go deranged or they die. Stimulants are sought in the midst of the struggle. Now it is opium, and now it is strong drink, anything to keep up the spirits or drive away the spectres of harrowing care. The country store supplies them with either the solid or the liquid medicine for their disease, and they take it with a good conscience because it seems to afford at least a temporary relief. This is among farmers in the country. And ladies in the city have even stronger temptations to this vice. When all sorts of parties are going on, parties the very names of which are unintelligible to the innocent ruralist, the exhaustion of life in town is immense. To get dressed for company is a draught on the system. A draught of something is often needed to supply the drain. The round of fashionable visiting, late hours, hot rooms, rich suppers, thin dress and great exposure, reaction following excitement in theatre, opera and balls, all these furnish as strong an inducement to take artificial stimulants as the man of business ever has. Thus women in the city are led into the habit of drinking, sometimes very privately, often without any concealment from the family.

How to get Strong.

Dumb-bells and horizontal bars, Indian clubs and the trapeze are valuable under certain conditions, but they are detrimental rather than beneficial if the blood is poor and thin and poisoned with bile. Use of the muscles necessitates waste as well as induces growth. If the blood does not carry sufficient nutritive material to repair the waste, loss of strength necessarily follows, and growth is out of the question. Purify and enrich your blood with Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery" and then exercise will develope and not consume your physique.

INVALIDS' HOTEL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE

No. 663 Main Street, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Not a Hospital, but a pleasant Remedial Home, organized with

A FULL STAFF OF EIGHTEEN PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS,

And exclusively devoted to the treatment of all Chronic Diseases.

This imposing Establishment was designed and erected to accommodate the large number of invalids who visit Buffalo from every State and Territory, as well as from many foreign lands, that they may avail themselves of the professional services of the Staff of skilled specialists in medicine and surgery that compose the Faculty of this widely-celebrated institution.

NOT ALWAYS NECESSARY TO SEE PATIENTS.

By our original system of diagnosis, we can treat many chronic diseases just as successfully without as with a personal consultation. While we are always glad to see our patients, and become acquainted with them, show them our institutions, and familiarize them with our system of treatment, yet we have not seen one person in five hundred whom we have cured. The perfect accuracy with which scientists are enabled to deduce the most minute particulars in their several departments, appears almost miraculous, if we view it in the light of the early ages. Take, for example, the electro-magnetic telegraph, the greatest invention of the age. Is it not a marvelous degree of accuracy which enables an operator to exactly locate a fracture in a submarine cable nearly three thousand miles long? Our venerable "clerk of the weather" has become so thoroughly familiar with the most wayward elements of nature that he can accurately predict their movements. He can sit in Washington and foretell what the weather will be in Florida or New York as well as if several hundred miles did not intervene between him and the places named. And so in all departments of modern science, what is required is the knowledge of certain signs. From these scientists deduce accurate conclusions regardless of distance. So, also, in medical science, diseases have certain unmistakable signs, or symptoms, and by reason of this fact, we have been enabled to originate and perfect a system of determining, with the greatest accuracy, the nature of chronic diseases, without seeing and personally examining our patients. In recognizing diseases without a personal examination of the patient, we claim to possess no miraculous powers. We obtain our knowledge of the patient's disease by the practical application, to the practice of medicine, of well-established principles of modern science. And it is to the accuracy with which this system has endowed us that we owe our almost world-wide reputation of skillfully treating lingering or chronic affections. This system of practice, and the marvelous success which has been attained through it, demonstrate the fact that diseases display certain phenomena, which, being subjected to scientific analysis, furnish abundant and unmistakable data, to guide the judgment of the skillful practitioner aright in determining the nature of diseased conditions. The most ample resources for treating lingering or chronic diseases, and the greatest skill, are thus placed within the easy reach of every invalid, however distant he or she may reside from the physicians making the treatment of such affections a specialty. Full particulars of our original, scientific system of examining and treating patients at a distance are contained in "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser." By R. V. Pierce, M. D. 1000 pages and over 300 colored and other illustrations. Sent, post-paid, for $1.50. Or write and describe your symptoms, inclosing ten cents in stamps, and a complete treatise, on your particular disease, will be sent you, with our terms for treatment and all particulars.

SIGNS OF DISEASE.

MARVELOUS SUCCESS.

OUR FIELD OF SUCCESS.

NASAL, THROAT AND LUNG DISEASES.

Recognizing the fact that no great institution dedicated exclusively to the treatment of chronic diseases, would meet the needs of the afflicted of our land, without the most perfect, complete and extensive provision for the most improved treatment of diseases of the air-passages and lungs, such as Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption, we have made this branch of our institution one of the leading Departments. We have every kind of useful instrument for examining the organs involved, such as rhinoscopes, laryngoscopes, stethoscopes, spirometers, etc., etc., as well as all of the most approved kinds of apparatus for the application of sprays, fumigations, atomizations, pulverizations, inhalations, and all other forms of approved medicinal applications.

We publish three separate books on Nasal, Throat and Lung diseases, viz.: A Treatise on Consumption, Laryngitis and Bronchitis; price, postpaid, ten cents; A treatise on Asthma, or Phthisic, giving new and successful treatment; price, postpaid, ten cents; A treatise on Chronic Nasal Catarrh, price, postpaid, two cents.

DISEASES OF DIGESTION.

Dyspepsia, "Liver Complaint," Obstinate Constipation, Chronic Diarrhea, Tape-worms, and kindred affections are among those chronic diseases in the successful treatment of which our specialists have attained unparalleled success. Many of the diseases affecting the liver and other organs contributing in their functions to the process of digestion, are very obscure, and are not infrequently mistaken by both laymen and physicians for other maladies, and treatment is employed directed to the removal of a disease which does not exist. Our Complete Treatise on diseases of the Digestive Organs will be sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in postage stamps.

KIDNEY DISEASES.

BRIGHT'S DISEASE, DIABETES, and kindred maladies, have been very largely treated, and cures effected in thousands of cases which had been pronounced beyond hope. The study and practice of chemical analysis and microscopical examination of the urine in our consideration of cases, with reference to correct diagnosis, in which our institution long ago became famous, has naturally led to a very extensive practice in diseases of the urinary organs. Our specialists have acquired, through a vast and varied experience, great expertness in determining the exact nature of each case, and, hence, have been successful in nicely adapting their remedies for the cure of each individual case.

The treatment of diseases of the urinary organs having constituted a prominent branch, or specialty, of our practice at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, and, being in constant receipt of numerous inquiries for a complete but concise work on the nature and curability of these maladies, we have published a large illustrated treatise on these diseases, which will be sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in postage stamps.

BLADDER DISEASES.

INFLAMMATION OF THE BLADDER, Gravel, Enlarged Prostate Gland, Retention of Urine, and kindred affections may be included among those in the cure of which our specialists have achieved marvelous success. These are fully treated of in our illustrated pamphlet on Urinary Diseases. It includes numerous testimonials from well-known people. Sent by mail for ten cents in stamps. Send for it at once.

STRICTURE.

STRICTURES AND URINARY FISTULÆ.—Hundreds of cases of the worst form of strictures, many of them greatly aggravated by the careless use of instruments in the hands of inexperienced physicians and surgeons, causing false passages, urinary fistulæ, and other complications, annually consult us for relief and cure. That no case of this class is too difficult for the skill of our specialists is proved by cures reported in our illustrated treatise on these maladies, to which we refer with pride. To intrust this class of cases to physicians of small experience, is a dangerous proceeding. Many a man has been ruined for life by so doing, while thousands annually lose their lives through unskillful treatment. Send particulars of your case and ten cents in postage stamps, for a large, illustrated treatise containing many testimonials.

NERVOUS DISEASES.

Epileptic Convulsions, or Fits, Paralysis, or Palsy, Locomotor Ataxia, St. Vitus's Dance, Insomnia, or inability to sleep, and threatened insanity, Nervous Debility, arising from overstudy, excesses, and other causes, and every variety of nervous affection, are treated by our specialists for these diseases with a measure of success heretofore regarded as impossible. See numerous cases reported in our different illustrated pamphlets on nervous diseases, any one of which will be sent for ten cents in postage stamps, when request for them is accompanied with a statement of a case for consultation, so that we may know which one of our Treatises to send.

DISEASES OF WOMEN.

So alarmingly prevalent are those chronic diseases peculiar to females, and so famous have our institutions become for their cure that we were long ago obliged to create a special department, thoroughly organized, and devoted exclusively to the treatment of these cases. The physicians and surgeons in this Department have made these delicate diseases their sole study.

Hundreds are brought to our institutions from far distant States on beds, and they go home well and strong. Every case consulting our specialists, whether by letter or in person, is given the most careful and considerate attention. Every important case (and we get few which have not already baffled the skill of all the home physicians) has the benefit of a full Council, composed of skilled specialists. Our Department and rooms for ladies in the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute are so arranged as to be very private, and free from the annoyances so common in other institutions. Send ten cents in postage stamps for our large Complete Treatise on Diseases of Women, illustrated with numerous wood-cuts and colored plates.

PILE TUMORS.

PILES, FISTULA IN ANO, and other diseases affecting the region of the lower bowel, are largely treated, and with marvelous success, by specialists, who give their whole time to the study and treatment of this class of affections. We never fail to cure pile tumors, however large. When the patient can come here for treatment, we will guarantee a cure.

Fortunately for suffering humanity, a method of treatment has been perfected and thoroughly tested in our institutions, by which in from six to fifteen days radical and perfect cures of the worst forms of piles are effected without causing any severe suffering. Send ten cents in stamps for our large illustrated Treatise on Piles.

RUPTURE.

Hernia (Breach), or Rupture, no matter of how long standing, of what size, or what the age of the patient may be (if not under four years), is speedily and radically cured in every case undertaken by our specialists, without the knife, without dependence upon trusses, without pain, and without danger.

THROW AWAY TRUSSES.

There is no longer any need of wearing clumsy, awkward, chafing, old trusses, which, at best, give only partial relief, which never cure, but often inflict great injury and induce inflammation and strangulation, from which thousands annually die.

NOT SAFE.

There is no safety in depending upon any kind of truss, though, no doubt, every man who has suffered the agonies of a strangulated hernia, and died, thought himself safe. Both the rupture and the truss keep up a mental strain and induce nervous debility and various organic weaknesses of the kidneys, bladder, and associate organs.

CURES GUARANTEED in every case undertaken. Can any sufferer ask for greater inducements than these?

Notwithstanding the great number of ruptures treated in the three years past, many of them of immense size and of such a character that no other plan of treatment could possibly have succeeded, every case to which this perfected system of treatment has been thoroughly applied, has been perfectly cured. Only a few days residence at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute is necessary.

Abundant references, by permission of those whom we have cured, will be furnished to any one wishing to call upon or write them.

An illustrated treatise on Rupture sent to any address upon receipt af ten cents.

DELICATE DISEASES.

Organic weakness, nervous debility, premature decline of the manly powers, involuntary vital losses, and kindred affections, are speedily, thoroughly and permanently cured.

To those acquainted with our institutions it is hardly necessary to say that the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, with the branch establishment located at No. 3 New Oxford Street, London, England, have, for many years, enjoyed the distinction of being the most largely patronized and widely celebrated institutions in the world for the treatment and cure of those affections which arise from youthful indiscretions and pernicious, solitary practices.

We, many years ago, established a special Department for the treatment of these diseases, under the management of some of the most skillful physicians and surgeons on our Staff, in order that all who apply to us might receive all the advantages of a full Council of the most experienced medical men.

WE OFFER NO APOLOGY.

We offer no apology for devoting so much attention to this neglected class of diseases, believing no condition of humanity is too wretched to merit the sympathy and best services of the noble profession to which we belong. Many who suffer from these terrible diseases contract them innocently. Why any medical man intent on doing good, and alleviating suffering, should shun such cases, we cannot imagine. Why any one should consider it otherwise than most honorable to cure the worst cases of these diseases, we cannot understand; and yet of all the other maladies which afflict mankind there are probably none about which physicians in general practice know so little.

We fully agree with the celebrated Dr. Bartholow, who says, "I think it a reproach to our profession that this subject has been permitted, in a measure by our own indifference, to pass into the hands of unscrupulous pretenders. Because the subject is disagreeable, competent physicians are loath to be concerned with it. The same unnecessary fastidiousness causes the treatment of this malady to be avoided in private practice."

We shall, therefore, continue, as heretofore, to treat with our best consideration, sympathy, and skill, all applicants who are suffering from any of these delicate diseases.

Our Complete and Illustrated Treatise on these subjects is sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in stamps.

ALL CHRONIC DISEASES A SPECIALTY.—Although we have, in the preceding paragraphs, made mention of some of the special ailments to which particular attention is given by the specialists at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, yet the institution abounds in skill, facilities, and apparatus for the successful treatment of every form of chronic ailment, whether requiring for its cure medical or surgical means.

All letters of inquiry or of consultation should be addressed to EGGS-ACTLY.—A subscriber in town tells us of a cute way he has of getting the best end of the bargain in the hen nuisance. He don't keep any himself, but fixes up, in quiet corners, tempting nests for the visiting chickens, who repay his kindness with a plentiful supply of fresh eggs. By-and-by the owners will probably discover the wrinkle and confine their feathered stock. This is a decidedly better way of dealing with the difficulty than clubbing the innocent birds, and quarrelling with your neighbors.—[Collingwood Bulletin.

C P R TRAVELLING SHOW.—The car containing the Manitoba and North-West exhibit, arrived on time at Markdale last Thursday, April 1st, under the management of Mr. E. A. Bailey, emigration commissioner for Manitoba, and assisted by Mr. S. A. Bedford, C. P. R. emigration agent, Moosomin, N. W. T. Hundreds of people visited the car during the afternoon and didn't consider themselves "April Fool'd" worth a cent, but were much pleased and profited by their visit. The great variety of grains, grasses, roots, minerals, &c., &c., were very tastefully arranged, and notwithstanding the fact that this car has been on the road the past six months, during which time it has been in the Martime Provinces, and the State of Maine, the samples are in fine condition. The only way to get a correct idea of the exhibit is to visit the car.

MR. GEO. LITTLE, Assessor of Holland, has completed his work and has handed in the following interesting return:—The real estate is assessed at $555,130, personal $49,575, and non-resident $22,160, making a total of $626,865. The number of acres cleared is 32,335, wood-land 24,732, marsh 3,538, orchard 278, and under fall wheat 566. The number of cattle is 3,218, horses 983, sheep 4,039, and hogs 789. (This probably does not include the number of these animals hid in cellars, root houses and other out-of-the-way places.) The total population of the township is 3,181. There are 989 of the population between the ages of 5 and 16, there are 489 between 7 and 13, and 297 between 16 and 21. The number of days road work is 3,122. The total assessment this year is compared with that of last year is raised over $100,000; and compared with 1882, when Mr. Little was Assessor before, there is a raise of over $200,000. The roll this year is the highest ever returned in the township, and still it is a good deal lower than it should be—a good deal lower proportionately than it is in Sullivan.—[Chatsworth correspondence in O. S. Advertiser.

WORTH REMEMBERING.

In a long letter from John H. Hall, of Baddick, Cape Breton, N. S., he says: "I believe were it not for Burdock Blood Bitters I should be in my grave." It cured me of kidney and liver complaint and general debility, which had nearly proved fatal.

ORAMEL.

BY ANDREW RAMSEY.

The following story is partly from the prose of Mrs. Sigourney wherein it appears that Cotton Mather, for some supposed injury, egged on the Mohicans to exterminate the Pequods. The latter, holding a feast in a fort in the State of Vermont, were surprised during the absence of their young chief Ontologon. Only the maiden Oramel escaped. She was cared for by a missionary near by; but the poem explains the rest:

At night within their fortress wall
The Pequods held a festival.
Ah, little thought they even new
Their watchdogs hailed the wary foe—
"Owanux," shrieked the sentinel,
Then many a bounding heart was still;
As fire the fort came forth with din,
From Pale Face, and from Mohican,
A hundred homes of whirling flame
Inscribed on high the glaring shame.
Among the tent flames to and fro,
The fierce, the tender fought, in woe
To save their weak ones; vain essay,
From fires that flash, and swords that slay;
Nor had the Christless carnage ceased
When morning lit the misty east,
And lit the writhing hosts who cry
On all their gods to let them die,
While free dom bayonets agonize
The hosts they sought to civilize.

Ah, to the heathen stained in thought,
Who grieves to find his home is not,
What saintly samples priestcrafts prove
Of Him whose symbol was the dove;
Yet one retired apart to pray;
That God might save what man would slay.

While faith his gentle spirit swayed,
There came a rushing in the shade—
The Pequod maiden heard his prayer,
And judged there might be justice there.
Faint as a frosted rose, and still,
Forth from her wounds a crimson rill,
In wandering ripple, bright and warm,
Flowed freshly o'er her neutral form,
For one short swooning moment she
Was bathed in brief tranquility;
And from her face one scarce could tell
What fate was her's, if ill or well:
A mingled march of peace, or pain;
Her years had gained that confluence when
The maiden's faith, the woman's fear,
So marvellously mixed appear.

Anon her lips essayed to speak,
The blood to tinge each tender cheek;
Back from the secret dream which hath
The still phenomenon of Death;
So passed the trance of peace away,
And reason reassumed its sway.

She saw the Christian standing by;
The Fort that could no more defy;
The blood becrimsoning her breast
Showed wretched memory the rest.
The ghostly guide with tender hand
Sustained her, striving to assuage
Her fears with tones all understand,
The brute, the savage, and the sage.

Five years rolled on, yet she remained
Encouraged by that Christian care,
And every summer added grace;
And faith made nature yet more fair.
Her glossy locks of raven hair
In excellent profusion spread
Around a face of tenderness
For love dissevered and the dead;
A joy the worldly never had.

One evening when the mottled sky
Glowed glorious in the sinking sun,
When heaven's serene immensity
Seemed throbbing forth the words, well done;
And sacred superhuman hues
Adorned each dim declivity
And shaped the intermingling views
As fair as Eden's landscapes be,
Oramel wandered forth alone
To dwell in thought on other days;
And many a vivid vision gone
Arose on memory's magic gaze.

There flashed in all their fervid force
The vales by which these waters came!
Far by the river's reedy source
She saw her early forest home;
The foliage flashing in the breeze,
The sparkling stream beneath the trees
Rolling its beaming waves away
Of azure, coursing gorgeously
To silent lakes of hely hues
All mottled ore with white canoes.

Again the dun deer bound along,
Again she hears her sister's song,
And tears bedim these sable eyes
To view her brother's form arise,
So rudely severed in their glee;
And he her chosen where is he?
Proud Ontelogon, he whose soul
Could all her destiny control?
He of the darkly beaming eyes,
The last of Pequod royalties?
Who sought the freckled fawn for her,
Whose words would strange emotions stir.

What sudden step arrests her ears?
A real form from vanished years
Close to her longing sight appears;
Quick as the memory of the heart,
By tender intonations stained,
The remnant of war's fatal art
Stood gazing on her form preferred.

As when an eagle high above
The crag containing all his love,
Poises his wing a transient while,
To see if aught has dared despoil
His nurslings in their gentle nest,
So gazed he forth from years of quest:

"Oramel, thou remembrest me,
I saw it by thy flashing gaze,
When on this hilltop suddenly
I stood, thy friend of other days;
I see it, for thy cheek's blood spake
Ere yet thy lips the words can make."

"O, living lover, every tone
Of thine renews the gladness gone;
Once more below our cedar tree
I feel thee wooing even me.
As oft before my mother's home
I watched thee with the evening come.
When from the vine the grape was shaken,
When from the snare the game was taken,
Thy footstep passed each maiden's door
To lay them all mine own before
And I was glad to see thee bring Bright flowers, and birds of vivid wing."

"Where is thy mother now? and those Who led the vengeance of thy foes?
Where is thy home so peaceful seen,
Still thro' thy memory gleaming green?
Not in our groves, not on one tree
A leaf remains to shelter me;
Bleached bones, and ruin black can tell
How fierce the white man's fury fell.
And from all rest below the blue
Thy foe my footsteps still pursue.

And even now, should it be known
My feet were on my father's sod,
There is no Christian but would own
My death a duty to his God.

I come to lead thee to the land
Where men are brave at my command,
The Pale Face has no portion there,
And none to fellow us shall dare,
Our moons will move in skies serene,
And thou shalt be a warrior's queen.
Help me to harbor mighty braves
To kindle war, as swelling waves
Roll down the mountain and destroy
All who those vales and homes enjoy."

Oramel raised her humid eyes,
As mists bedim soft azure skies,
"The desolation of our race
Finds tears familiar to my face;
But, 'till this hour, I did not know
Our fathers' sun had set so low,
And now another grief is mine,
This homeless loneliness of thine!

Yet curse not those who might have brought
A blight on me, but peace have given;
They taught my spirit life, they taught Patience, and hope, and faith, and heaven."

"And is the white man's God and thee
At peace?" the gloomy chief replied;
"And can our wrongs forgotten be
By us whom they have sundered wide,
Butchered, and burned? and canst thou thus Requite our race's wretchedness?
Their softened lies have filled thy ear
Till truth can find no entrance there.
Their hateful hearts have hardened thine,
Once full of tenderness for mine.
Were not thy love to me as light,
The only moonbeam of my night,
I could have spurned e'en thee, when thou
Didst own thy willingness to bow
Before their God who lets them do Deeds mournful to our Manitou."

"O, Ontelogon, I could leave
The kindness of my Christian home,
Once more the free-born air to breathe,
And follow where thy feet may roam,
To be the solace of thy fate,
As dwells the wild dove with its mate.

No tones like thine my heart has heard
Since sitting by my mother's knee;
She knew not how my soul was stirred
When listening to her praise of thee;
And still I hear my bosom tell
Its willingness with thine to dwell.

Oft have I longed to hear thy voice
Fall softly over early air;
Oft in my dreams, which hold thee choice
Our infant innocence I share;
Surely thy mere than friend can be
God's servant true, and true to thee?

And oft when gazing on the sun
Shed his last beams from hill to hill,
I wished my day, like his was done,
Then bade my aching heart be still;
For I have at His altar sworn,
And from my vow I dare not turn!

Yea, Ontelogon, I have sworn
My feet may not forsake His road;
And tho' with thee I gladly turn
May He not be our guide and God?
Our faithful love He will not mar
In whose high charge our spirits are."

As when by winds an ash is shaken,
Ere fall, of many leaves forsaken,
More storms can bear when these have left,
So stood he still of love bereft.

"Meet me, Oramel, yet once more!
I cannot leave thee to thy fate,
But for thy safety yon dim shore
Shall hide me, near the haunts of hate
Then turn again thy tender feet
And meet me where these waters meet;
When in the stream its star is seen
To gild the gloom of reedy green,
My birch canoe shall wait for thee
Below yon shady alder tree;
And we will sail to safer climes,
Unknown to Christians or their crimes."

He turned, and vanished in the shade,
And night returned around the maid.

You who have borne the blame, and blight,
Of scorn for love of God and right;
Tortured by loves incertitude
Which is the soul's most fatal mood,
Have found enough to make a fate
Unutterably desolate,
If not upheld by that which gives
Thy heart the hope wherein it lives.
He who had planted in her breast
The thrilling raptures of unrest;
Whom she in thought, to death resigned,
Had suddenly returned to find Henceforth her joy and his must be
The sunset of their destiny.

Again another day has gone,
And silent evenings florid glow
Is lovely in the sky above,
And lovely in the vale below,
As from her orient abode
The moon moved up her mottled road.

Again another day has gone,
The hosts of starry space appear;
Each smiling from his ancient zone,
As if there were no sorrows here;
Again the waving groves receive
The silver vestures moonbeams weave.

And, half revealed by light and shade,
So softly sifted o'er the scene,
Stood Ontologon and the maid
Beneath an umber alder screen;
He held her hand but gazed apart,
To hide her beauty from his heart.

"Oramel, since I saw thee last,
My way with clouds was overcast;
The' time is gracious in the sun,
My hours like streams of midnight run;
My hopes in withered blossoms hang
To ornament the serpent's mare.

Maddened by fears of losing thine
To him, my hated enemy,
I spoke the strong and stormy words,
Fierce as the goaded forest herds,
For thou alone art left to bless
My recollection's wretchedness.
I think how dark my moons will move,
With none of all my kind to love!
There lives no foot but thine to come
In Ontologon's lonely home!
'Tis thine to fill its vacant place,
And aid me raise my fallen race.
But now thine eyes the answer own
The way shall not be trod alone,
For thou shalt be the summer beams
To my chilled spirit's icebound streams.

The hills, the streams that we behold
Spread forth in moonlight mistily,
Our butchered brethren owned of old,
From all their sources to the sea.
On many an ancient mountain brow
The council fires are quenched, and now
No Pequod speeds his pine canoe
Along the lanes of liquid blue.
Gone, like the fish when floods are dry,
Like flowers when rain forgets the sky;
Gone are the flags when frosts begin—
Our white foe bribed the Mohican
To hide by night amid the brake,
As spiders snare the prey, or snake,
They sprang among us in our sleep.
And none remained at morn to weep.
The Uncas joined the Christian foe,
And gave us words which end in woe;
They brought us fire-drink, and they gave
The red men draughts to make them rave;
They roused our passions into wrong,
Then slaughtered us when they grew strong.

But now the shadows longer grow,
And Ontelogon too must go,
An outcast in another land,
With none to take him by the hand.
With none, when sick, to give him bread,
Or over him the blanket spread;
With none to bury him, or tell
Where Ontelogon's ashes dwell."

"I will go with thee, yea, forsake
My home, thy future path to make Less desolate o'er many a hill;
But hinder not, O let me still
Bow, tho' I bow alone, to Him
Whose eyes with love were often dim,
Or where the western rivers roll,
To keep his Sabbaths in my soul?"

"Oramel, I must not deceive
Thy spirit, tho' my answers grieve,
For well I know the white man's vow
Is vacant as this moonlit glow;
His word is fair but never binds
More than the passing summer winds.

My heart is happier in its gloom
Than thou could'st make it, if to come
With thy foe's plague spot on thy breast
To break my father's future rest.
If thy green pathway joins with mine,
The Christian God shall ne'er be thine.
Maid of the darkly tender eye,
Our days are rolling swiftly by;
Drear as a shrub forsaken plain,
A leafless landscape in the rain,
Age-bended men, with moonlit hair,
While waiting in the valley where Death's sea receives the troubled stream,
Look back and call it all a dream!
How oft we find the crooked path
A sudden termination hath!

Oramel, hear! our hunting grounds,
Beyond the midnight thunder sounds,
With all their herds, or fields of light,
Without thee, would not rest my sight.
Oramel, once again I plead—
O lead me, let thy white feet lead
Back to the Manitou, my guide,
In this world and the next, my bride.
He will forgive that thou didst speak
Of wandering, for the heart is weak.

Yon moving moon begins to lower,
My bark is swaying near ashore;
My home beyond the hills is thine,
Then place thy faithful hand in mine."

"Friend of my spirit, freely take
My lowly future; for thy sake
More than this life I could resign,
Or all the seasons that were mine,
Since last we parted by the still
Green valley of our village hill.
The waterlily doth not give Much shadow to the willing wave.
Then why refuse that I may live
In love here and beyond our grave?
Do rills offend their fountain source,
For refuge rolling to the sea?
Surely to shape my coming course
In peace can scarcely hinder thee,
When hunting with thy loving bride?
Christ's lovers death can ne'er divide,
For after such our souls shall go
Where ever flashing rivers flow.
But, in my soul I dare not be False to my God for even thee."

"Then cleave to thy deceiver's side,
And be a base betrayer's bride.
A slave to his luxurious lust;
His beast, who never kept a trust.
Was it for this my heart has borne
Dark days of every solace shorn,
Save the one hope my memory held
Of thee—too suddenly dispelled?
Was it for this I bowed my pride?
For thee, near hateful foes to hide?
Crouching, when dawn his flag unfurled,
Until the daylight left the world?

Risking my hated life to share
Unseen near thee the selfsame air.
Then came when misty starlight rolled
Bright stillness where thy footsteps strolled
Once more to hear the only voice
That said, or e'er can say, rejoice!
For this I dragged from day to day
The life I longed to cast away,
When on these hills estranged I strode
To view afar thy dim abode;
Yet seemed to hear the lone wind sigh,
"Oramel liveth, wherefore die?"

So have I yearned thy tones to hear;
And when thy words fell in my ear:
"I will go with thee," sudden light
Burst in upon my soul of night.
But we have met to part, behold!
My coming moon is doubly cold;
I hear the midnight tempest moan,
I meet my murdered race alone."

"I cannot bear that thou should'st be
Pained by my heart that loves thee!
I pine to dream to beguile
And shade thy solitude to smile.
I pray thee, Ontelogon, hear
My transient story, many a tear
Refused to leave his dried heart,
Since first from mine thy path did part.

When last I saw thee leave our home,
Afar o'er forest hills to roam,
I did not think such years of pain
Would pass before we met again:
But they have fled my early friend
And all that are to come will end;
And each year's solitary flight
Seemed to contain less day than night,
Until a more than mortal joy
Came down my darkness to destroy.
Then my glad spirit's holy glow
Vowed heaven an enduring vow,
And gladly would I read to thee
Those words of rapture, 'pardon me,'
The words are wise of which I spake;
But shall be silent for thy sake."

At length, his soothing somewhat sped,
He slow addressed the suffering maid;
His voice seemed mild, nor did unfold
His desolation unconsoled.

"If thou wilt make my future thine,
And be forever wholly mine,
Not even dreary death will dare
Thy trusting soul from mine to tear;
But choose thy fathers' murderer's God,
And take a separated road."

And she must speak her lover's doom.
Tho' with her heart's blood words must come.
How in her faithful spirit strove
Her love to God, her human love!—
A glance o'er life, the hopes that mock—
Anon his fate the silence woke—
"Ontelagon, spare my woe!
I dare not from my Saviour go!"

Then with a gesture slow he drove
His still bark from the reedy cove
Of alder shadows where it swung
The moon-forsaken waves among.
But soon he ceased to row, and still
The boat went drifting at its will;
'Twas that reaction which succeeds
The struggle when the spirit bleeds.

Oramel stood there on the hill
That overlooks the bending shore;
She watched her wavering hope, until
He vanished, to return no more.

He did not raise his head or hand,
He sought no signal from the land,
No tender sign to check the pain
Of parting, ne'er to meet again.
A parting farther than the grave,
The wreck of all she sought to save.

And o'er her soul the feeling came
That she must bear his blighting blame
For all their future's wreck and doom;
And, O, the thought! his life of gloom!
And memory all his words retraced
In fondness ne'er to be defaced,
And round her spirit's tissues wove
His last sad words of grief and love—
A fearful tumult of the brain!
A mental whirl where naught was plain,
Save that he would not come again.
No sound awoke the silence save
The ripple of the reedy wave,
A rustle of a rising gale
Among the willows of the vale.
And when the misty moonlight ceased,
And morning lit the misty east
With emblems of returning day,
She homeward took her weary way.

AN EGYPTIAN ROMANCE.

A Story of Love and Wild Adventure, founded upon Startling Revelations in the Career of Arabi Pasha.

By the Author of "NINA, THE NIHILIST," "THE RED RIDER," "THE RUSSIAN SPY, ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

"YOUR DAUGHTER IS ALREADY MY WIFE BY MOSLEM LAW."

Nellie was in a very agitated and hysterical state by the time she got indoors. A glass of wine restored her in some measure, but her agitation grew stronger than ever when Arabi Pasha entered the room closely followed by a Ulema or Moslem priest in long flowing robes and a Protestant clergyman in orthodox black coat and white tie.

"I hope you will not think me guilty of unseemly haste, Miss Trezarr," said Arabi Pasha, coming forward. "My time belongs to such an extent to my country that I can devote but very little of it even to my nearest and my dearest. It is also of the greatest importance, both for your own sakes and your own, that you should leave three as quickly as possible regain the safe shelter of my palace at Cairo, where at present the populace are much less incensed against your creed and race than they are here in Alexandria, where, perhaps, in a very short while even the soldiers would refuse to protect you. Your parents having decided that it will be for your supreme welfare that you become my wife, I have here a priest of my faith and one of your own, in order that nothing may be wanting to make the union a sacred one, and believe me when I say that in the future you shall never regret it," and here he came to a full stop and looked for a reply.

"Oh, God, have pity on me. I believe that you mean me well and that you love me well, but I cannot marry you. I am not yet forty-four hours a widow and my heart is in the bloody grave of a murdered husband, murdered by the fanatics of your creed."

"The fanatics of all creeds murder upon occasion," replied the war minister, somewhat bitterly, "and, besides, I gather from your priest (pointing towards the Anglican clergyman) that your marriage yesterday was not a lawful one and that, therefore, you have no husband. He says that being under age you could not have really married without your parents' consent."

"How came you to learn that I was married at all yesterday? I only informed my parents of the fact a quarter of an hour ago," exclaimed our heroine, sharply.

The war minister looked confused for a minute, but then made answer:

"I cannot explain at length, but I know everything that occurrs in Alexandria. It is a necessity of my position and of the organized times. Come, Miss Trezarr, rather, my own Nellie, surely your parents know what is best for you? They are your natural protectors and your best friends, your truest friends, and those that have your interests most at heart. You will yield to their advice and entreaties, I am sure?"

"In all other matters but this present. But in this I would die rather."

He looked very like a dead block and as he might have proved had not the Anglican clergyman came to the rescue.

No doubt he was a well meaning man and one, moreover, grateful to the war minister for having preserved his life, an event that had taken place an hour previously.

"In France," said the minister, "which I will not say is a Christian country—to a certain extent at least—parents marry their children without their having any voice in the matter, and I have been told that such unions, as a rule, turn out happier than those wherein daughters are left to choose for themselves. Perhaps it would not be well to follow such precedent except in exceptional cases, but where such important issues are at issue as in the present instance we have—haw—that is to say—"

"Quite so, my dear sir—quite so. I catch your meaning perfectly. And you would have added, if I hadn't interrupted you, that this is just one of those cases—aw—aw—where a beloved child is non compos mentis by reason of severe and repeated shocks to the system, and so really does not know what is good, proper and right for her to do."

This in excited tones from Mr. Trezarr, to which the clergyman nodded assent.

"Then the ceremony shall proceed," said Mr. Trezarr, still more rapidly than before. "This marriage is the dearest wish of both her father's and mother's hearts, we know that it is for her future interest, happiness and welfare, and that her choice—that is to say their choice—is a noble-minded, large-hearted patriot, whom history will pronounce the greatest man of his age—the preserver of his country—the—the—the—and so on."

It was at this juncture that an Egyptian servant, domestic, somewhat showily appareled, entered in a tray of refreshments and laid it on the table.

As he turned round to retire, he winked at Nellie and also screwed up his mouth in a peculiar kind of a way, yet she noticed neither action.

But the fellow did not seem to be one bit disconcerted, for the next instant he performed the same impressive though not particularly expressive pantomime right in Mr. Trezarr's face, as the banker stood somewhat apart from the rest and nigh unto the door, and then he said in impressive, but low-toned accents, "You'll get into a mess, old man; you'll fall between two stools, you know," and finished up by pressing something into his hand.

The scrap of paper proved to be a cutting from the morning's Commerce, a daily paper published in Alexandria, and though he could not take time to read it all through, half a minute or less had glanced over it caught its full significance.

It was an official notice from the Khedive, stating that in view of the vast number of the native population who were thrown out of work and actually starving, owing to the closing of the European places of business in Alexandria and Cairo, his highness would guarantee against any loss at the hands of rebels all who would be bold enough to open their banks, counting houses, manufactories or shops and carry on their respective trades or businesses as usual; but that at the same time no Europeans should be entitled to any indemnity who had, save under compulsion amounting to fear of death, afforded any aid to or resorted with the rebels, whether such aid consisted in money, arms, rations, or even their open countenance and support, but, on the contrary, their wealth should be confiscated, and they themselves should be outlawed," and then the proclamation went on to say that "with the aid of his highness's allies the rebellion would very shortly be quelled and order restored throughout Egypt."

The expression of Mr. Trezarr's face when he had finished reading was the most comical one imaginable.

"Wealth confiscated! outlawed! for only consorting with rebels? By Jove, what then will become of me for bestowing my daughter on this arch rebel and availing myself of his protection and countenance all through the entire affair if the Khedive's party only get the upper hand again? Can that aw, Gladstone, really mean anything more than his usual bounce, I wonder? Arabi has persuaded me, and I've persuaded myself, too, that it will be all smoke and no fire, just as it was at Dulcigno. I wish I knew what those d—— ironclads really meant to be about."

Thus the banker reflected, and it might have been as well perhaps if he had not reflected quite so long, for the war minister at this moment came up with a smiling face to inform him that the Ulema had done his work, that the Moslem marriage rite was over and that the Christian one was about to be commenced.

"Don't you think that after all the second ceremony had better be postponed," stammered Mr. Trezarr. "At all events for a few days; yes, for a few days, we will say."

"That is as you like," responded Arabi, with a slight elevation of the brows. "The second ceremony was to satisfy your own scruples. Your daughter is already my wife by Moslem law, and as my wife I shall assuredly henceforth treat her."

"You told me your position was quite secure. That the fleets would only threaten!"

"I said rightly. Look out of the window and you will see the entire French squadron steaming away toward Port Said. The British will soon follow them."

"I hope so; I really hope so. But it seems to me that the ships of every other nation are getting away as well, and under every inch of canvas that they can spread."

Arabi gave utterance to what sounded very like an oath, as glancing in turn toward the window he perceived that Mr. Trezarr spoke the truth.

"It looks strange, as though they were running from some apprehended immediate danger," said he. "True I received the British admiral's ultimatum yesterday, but of course it is merely an idle threat made to please and humbug the bondholders. A British Liberal government will hardly dare to trample under foot a national uprising such as ours, I therefore say again, as I have often said before, that it is Dulcigno repeated."

Hardly had the words quitted his lips, however, when a sonorous boom came from seaward that caused every window in the house to shake, and it was quickly followed by an awful roar as though the very heavens had been rent asunder. The terrible bombardment of Alexandria had commenced.

CHAPTER XLIX.

IN WHICH THE CANNON ROAR AND THE DUMB SPEAK.

The voice of the "loud mouthed artillery" spoke only one sentence to Mr. Trezarr, and kept on repeating that sentence, which took the form of "You've fallen between two stools, for it's all up with Arabi. You've fallen between two stools, for it's all up with Arabi." The bombardment opened, he knew that Great Britain had gone too far to recede with honor, too far to be able to back out without disgrace, and that she stood irrevocably pledged to stand by her protege, Prince Tewfik.

But the effect of the roaring of the cannon, the rattling of the Gatlings and Nordenfeldts and the shrieking hiss of the rockets had a very different effect on Arabi Pasha to that it had on any of the other auditors in that room assembled.

It seemed to change his aspect, usually so calm and benignant, into that of a perfect fiend.

"I have been deceived, betrayed, lured on by false hopes only to be crushed at last by the most unexpected of events. Curse the British government for not being consistent in its duplicity and for raising the lying cry of 'Wolf! Wolf!' so often that at last no one believed that the animal would ever be unchained. But this is no time for idle words, for great deeds are expected of me, and by Allah and the prophet, great deeds shall yet be wrought. Ladies and gentlemen, you must at once take refuge in the underground cells and cellars, where alone you will be safe, for this building stands directly open to the fire of at least three of the British ironclads, whose huge balls may at any moment knock it into a shapeless heap of stones, and yet you are a hundred times safer here than you would be in the streets," he said.

Nellie's expression of face betokened that she felt safer now than she had done five minutes previously, before the bombardment had commenced, and the war minister noticed this and bit his lip savagely.

He clapped his hands thrice, and then walking across to her said brusquely:

"You are my wife, little one, whether you like it or no, and so you will have to submit to the will of Allah and to content yourself with what cannot be avoided.

He threw his arm around her and would have kissed her had she not struggled violently and so escaped the embrace.

Her mother did not censure her for so doing, but sat phlegmatically still, and Mr. Trezarr did not even notice the action, for he was still muttering "D——Gladstone!" and "I've fallen between two stools," by turns.

Arabi Pasha plainly enough noticed the change in Nellie's parents' sentiments toward him, and equally plainly knew the cause.

"If after all I can climb to the top of the tree and maintain myself there I will show them that I remember it, and give them good reason for remembering it also," he muttered to himself, but as his two orderlies at this juncture entered the room in answer to his handclapping he turned round and said to them:

"Ratib and Khassim, escort these, my honored guests, below stairs and make such empty cells as you have at disposal as comfortable for them as possible, with carpets and other necessaries taken from the rooms above. Place at their service as a guard over them—a guard, I mean to say, for their protection—such men as you can depend on for fidelity, and remember that you two will have to answer to me with your lives, if necessary, for whatever evil happens to them whilst they are in your keeping."

Having thus issued his instructions he turned again to Mr. and Mrs. Trezarr and said:

"You will do well to at once follow my orderlies, and to take your daughter, my wife, with you."

He then again tried to take Nellie's hand, and this time she gave it him, for she did not like to part with any one in anger, especially when there was a possibility that she would never see them more. But when encouraged by this action, he essayed to kiss her, she once more repulsed him and her eyes flashed angrily as she did so.

He made no further effort, but said, somewhat pointedly:

"Farewell, then, my wife, until we next meet," and nodding haughtily to them whom he considered to be his father and mother-in-law he adjusted his sword and sallied out of the room.

No sooner had he gone than the orderlies (the same two who, on the preceding day, conducted Captain Donelly to his place of his imprisonment), made a sign to the Trezarr party to follow them, which they lost no time in doing. They soon found themselves in a narrow passage, and descending a somewhat steep incline into what was evidently, from the humid smell that came up from below, some sort of a subterranean.

When they had got to the bottom they came to ranges of doors on either side, some of which were open, others closed and fastened with heavy chains and bars.

A minute or two later she beheld her father and the clergyman pushed into one of these presumed dungeons, whilst a few seconds more saw her mother and herself the tenants of another, and before leaving them there one of the orderlies said in a mixture of French and Egyptian, which Nellie could just make out the meaning of:

"We must lock you up, but not so much to prevent your getting out as to hinder others from getting in to cut your throats. But that our lives would pay the forfeit we would gladly do that ourselves, but as his excellency would have our heads, even if others did it, we will take the greatest care of you, for great is the self love of most men."

"I don't think that anything can hurt us here," said Nellie, "for the ground rises outside even to half the height of the window, and the bottom of that is at least four feet above our heads as we stand upright. Oh, there is a strange noise at the door."

"I believe it is some one trying to speak to us through the keyhole. Hist, Nellie."

At first it sounded like a mere blowing through the keyhole—a blowing that was first cousin to a human whistle, however—but on Nellie going close over to the door and bending her head down until it was almost on a level with the lock, the whistle changed into plainly articulated words, and this was what the words were:

"I'm dumb, but I've my wits about me, so cheer up, for fair and easy goes far in a day and all's well what ends well, only the ending ain't come."

Then the voice ceased and the sound of stealthy receding footsteps took its place.

CHAPTER L.

STONE WALLS DO NOT A PRISON MAKE, NOR IRON BARS A CAGE.

Surely no propphesy, even of the Sphinx, could have been much more incomprehensible to the uninitiated than the one which had just been telephened through the keyhole.

It was intended to give hope, that was certain, and it was spoken in English, which perhaps, was the most hopeful thing about it, but more than those two facts had to be guessed at.

It is impossible to detect the natural tones of a man's voice when it is sent through such an orifice, more especially when it is reduced to a whisper, so that Nellie, convinced of the futility of the attempt, soon gave up even guessing, and her mother had never commenced to guess.

Perhaps it would have been just as well had both ladies occupied their minds in that manner, since it would in some degree have relieved the monotony of their confinement, for it was impossible for either of them to climb up and look out of the upper portion of the little square window (the lower half was beneath the level of the ground outside) as Frank Donelly had done in his cell the preceding day, but was not now doing.

The reader may wonder at this and think it most strange that he should not be seeing all that he could see of the momentous events that were occurring without.

But the fact was that like a true Irishman Frank didn't care much about a row unless he could plunge into the very middle of it; and besides, he was turning the terrible excitement and the terrific din to (as he most sincerely hoped) better account in another way.

For he had found in one of his pockets one of those knives that seem to comprise an entire tool chest, the majority of his instruments being enclasped at the back by a crooked picker for getting a stone out of a horse's shoe, and the young officer had taken it into his head that with it he might be able to pick his way through a stone wall to freedom.

He thought he remembered that the cell next to his own on the right was unoccupied and the door open.

If, therefore, he could tunnel through the wall into it he would have no further obstacle to overcome save the living ones, and he decided that he wouldn't even think about them just yet.

So he set to work at once, and as molten Egyptian mortar is very poor and Egyptain stone of a very soft and crumbling nature, he now discovered that in all probability his task would be an easier one than he had at first calculated on.

As, however, under the most favorable circumstances, it will take several hours to accomplish, we will leave him at his monotonous labors and perhaps pop back to see how he gets on by and by. For the present, place aux dames.

Not that we shall gain much by the change of scene, for one prison cell is very like another, and even lady captives are not wont to be very lively companions.

Once their dungeon door was opened to admit of a quantity of rugs and cushions being thrown in, to which was presently added a basket of somewhat dainty comestibles, a jug of sherbet and a couple of chibouques, with the necessary accompaniments.

Nellie spread out the rugs, arranged the cushions, and generally set their little room in order, though more for a mother's ease and comfort than her own.

Meanwhile, the thunder of the monster guns continued without interruption, mingled with the shrieking hiss of rockets and the hoarse rattle of the Nordenfeldts and Gardners.

Nellie would have given much had she only been able to clamber up to the window to look out, but there was no wooden stretcher bedstead in this cell, as in Frank Donelly's, to drag underneath to mount on, and even had there been, with the block pillow as well, Nellie, when standing atop of both, would still have been too short by a good head and shoulders to have been able to see out.

As for eating, she felt that the mere attempt would choke her, but the cool, refreshing sherbet was most grateful to her parched throat and her hot, fevered lips; for, added to her mental torture and the deep grief which she felt for her husband's supposed death and which she did not dare to express openly, the blows and lashes which the cruel and vindictive princess had inflicted on her still pained her excessively.

Once or twice she wondered how her father and the Anglican clergyman were getting on in the adjoining cell on the right, and oftener still she wondered what a strange kind of scraping noise would betoken against the other side of the wall on their left, which, having a very sharp ear, she could plainly distinguish whenever there was any perceptible lull in the fury of the bombardment.

When she called her mother's attention to the fact the good lady said first of all that it was sheer imagination, and then declared all of a sudden that she heard it distinctly, and that it was the death watch and forebolled their own immediate slaughter.

This cheerful way of regarding the phenomenon hindered Nellie from making any further reference to it, and so the day wore on, and on, and at last the increasing darkness (where it had been dimness and gloom from the first) told them that night was at hand; indeed, the shrill Muzzin cry, which from the many minarets rose above even the thunder of the artillery, had proclaimed the sunset some minutes previously, even as in peice and war alike it had proclaimed it for nearly two thousand years.

All at once, too, the roar of the cannon, which had continued without intermission for ten hours, ceased, and the stillness appeared heavy oppressive after so much noise.

And yet it was not a complete silence, for now that all other sounds were still, that monotonous scraping and tapping could be heard more plainly than ever, as well as Mrs. Trezarr's oft repeated ejaculation of "The death watch! The death watch! No doubt about it!"

It seemed to give the good lady a kind of morbid satisfaction to be continually croaking forth an ill omened prediction, but after awhile Nellie ceased to hear it, and for the simple reason that sheer exhaustion at length won the victory over her mental and other sufferings and plunged her into a deep and dreamless sleep.

'Twas destined, however, to be only of a very few hours' continuance, and to be disturbed in a very strange, alarming and unaccountable manner, for she was suddenly aroused by some one tumbling over her, and then as she opened her eyes, she felt two hands feeling her face and heard a voice exclaim in half angry and half despairing accents:

"All my labor has been in vain, then I thought this cell was empty and the door open, instead of which here is another unfortunate, and doubtless as securely locked up as I was. I have turned two dangers into one, that is all, confound it."

"Nellie, don't be talking in your sleep," grunted Mrs. Trezarr in a semi-conscious state, but the fair girl never heard the protest, for her heart stood still at the sound of that other voice, which seemed to be so strangely familiar to her.

The owner thereof had, however, caught Mrs. Trezarr's words, or at all events the word to him most important of them, the name of Nell, and now he exclaimed in an excited whisper:

"For God's sake, speak. I cannot, dare not ask who you are. Speak! speak!"

But there was no need of speech, for at that instant the electric light from one of the British ironclads (again searching along the shore to discover what the Egyptians were about inside their batteries) threw a radiance as of a newborn day into the dungeon cell and showed the wife unto the husband and the husband unto the wife.

In a moment Nellie had sprung to her feet and thrown herself into Frank's arms with a glad cry; whilst Mrs. Trezarr, turning her heavy head on the pile of cushions which she had heaped underneath it ere consigning herself to the arms of Morpheus, at last succeeded in opening her eyes, which no sooner had she done than (taking in what looked very like a most ghostly stage tableau with lime-light effects) she screamed out: "Their spirits! Their spirits! I knew that the death watch didn't tick for nothing," and would undoubtedly have gone into hysterics under the supposition that her daughter had been dragged forth and murdered whilst she slept, and that her ghost, in company with her previously slaughtered husband's, had come to visit her in this melodramatic manner, had not yet another cause of alarm acted as an antidote.

This second cause of alarm lay in the sudden opening of the dungeon door and a voice exclaiming thereat, in an angry whisper:

"Dry up, will ye? Bedad me' if the faymale beggars don't beat a mill wheel at clicking. I wonder how ye'd bear it, old lady, if ye was as deaf and dumb as meself?"

Buried in a Stone Jar.

Near Burkesville, Ky., on the Cumberland River, a man named Raven was one day fishing off the bank. This was in 1866, or a year later. The bank was of clay, six or eight feet above the water, and Raven sat with his legs hanging over. He had been sitting there for an hour, swinging his heels against the bank, when his boot struck something which gave out a curious sound, and he instinctively looked down. Between his feet he saw a stone jar, or at least a portion of one, protruding from the bank. It was at least four feet below the surface, and he had considerable trouble to unearth it. When he had done so, however, and removed the wooden cover fastened over the mouth, he found the contents to consist of a gold watch, three or four gold rings, six silver teaspoons, $300 in Kentucky State bank bills, $50 in gold, $20 in silver half dollars, and about a quart of dimes and five-cent pieces. Although the jar was tightly corked, the dampness had got in and mildewed the bank notes until they fell to pieces in his hands. Had they been all right, however, they would have been of no intrinsic value, as all the State bank circulation had given place to greenbacks. Speculation as to who planted the jar brought no clue to the owner further than that it could have been no resident of the country. It had probably been in the ground many years, for the river had been eating away at the bank with each freshet, and finally brought a portion of the jar to light. It must have been buried six or eight feet from the bank at first.

A Canadian Dog Story.

A lad was crossing the fields in the country, some distance from any dwelling, when he was pursued by a large and fierce dog belonging to the gentleman whose land he was crossing. The lad was alarmed and ran for his life. He struck into a piece of woods and the dog gained on him, when he looked around to see how near the creature was, and, tumbling over a stone, he pitched over a precipice and broke his leg. Unable to move, and at the mercy of the beast, the poor fellow saw the dog coming down upon him, and expected to be seized and torn, when, to his surprise, the dog came near, and, perceiving the boy was hurt, instantly wheeled about and went for that aid which he could not render himself. There was no one within reach of the child's voice, and he must have perished there or have dragged his broken limb along and destroyed it, so as to render amputation necessary, if the dog had not brought help. The dog went off to the nearest house and barked for help. Not receiving the attention, he made another visit of sympathy to the boy, and then to the house, there making such demonstrations of anxiety that the family followed him to the place where the child lay.

A grand feature in the A. O. U. W. is the Relief Society which has recently been added to the organization, which entitles its members to from $900 to $1,200. according to age. Out of this sum he can draw, in case of sickness, or accident causing dissability, $10 per week, or in case a member is totally disabled he can draw $300 a year for three years, the balance, if any, to be paid at his death. This does not affect the A. O. U. W. certificate of $2,000, but is separate, the members having the privilege of taking advantage of this new and valuable feature, the admission fee being only $5. The Relief Society, though connected with the A. O. U. W., is self-sustaining. Every member should post himself on the working of the Relief Society.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—In your issue of the 18th of March an article appears over the signature of R. H. Stinson, which has only to be read to give the most casual observer an idea of the disposition and character of the writer. That "I knew too much for him" fully explains the over-weening self-conceit of the man. Then follows a tirade of personal abuse which is seldom met with in a public journal. Your foot note, Mr. Editor, fully explains your opinion as to the propriety of allowing such billingsgate to appear in the columns of your paper. But as some men will hang themselves if they can only get rope enough, it is well that you did allow this wolf in sheep's clothing an opportunity to expose the depravity of his heart. Of course Mr. Stinson prides himself in being very popular where he formerly resided, and boasts of being presented, on leaving with a copy of the Scriptures. It is a pity that a perusal of that good book hadn't a more salutary effect upon his life and conversation. But, Sir, be that as it may, I heard a lady say that if Mr. Stinson would only leave this neighborhood, she would willingly give him six Bibles, and considers his removal would be sufficient remuneration for the money invested. But, Mr. Editor, to be brief, this difficulty arose through the actions of Mr. Stinson, (as he claims to be the centre around which all the others revolve) by collecting and keeping on hand a large amount of the people's money as a surplus than was necessary; and when the school grant was retained until a second grant was forthcoming before being applied to its legitimate use, suspicions did arise, and some were wicked enough to charge Mr. Stinson, not with dishonesty in the matter, but in his extremity of using the surplus for his own private purposes. This, Mr. Editor, is the whole trouble in a nut shell, and an investigation of such matters should not arouse the ire of an honest and intelligent man; and Stinson's own actions, as admitted in his letter, show conclusively that he is not such an adept in school law as he imagines, otherwise he would not have disqualified himself by retaining the school moneys in his hands as Sec.-Treas. under the plea of having made an imitation of a blackboard on the wall. As to the character of those who he maligns, it is unnecessary to say much; they have all resided in this section of country as long as Mr. Stinson and (it is not saying much for them) that their actions, either private or public, will bear a comparison with that gentleman's.

Thanking you for so much space in your valuable paper, I remain

Yours truly,

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Afflictions, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. Noyes, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, N. Y.

"WHOOP IT UP."

Probably one of the most difficult complaints to doctor is whooping cough. When treated by ordinary means the poor victom is left to whoop it up as best he can. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam gives relief in this as well as many throat, bronchial, and lung troubles.

CHASED BY A BEAR.—On Sunday afternoon, the 21st ult., as Mr. Elijah Page, jr., of Melancthon, was going from his farm on the 3rd line to his father's on the 2nd line, and passing through a bush, he met a large bear sitting on a fallen tree. Mr. Page being entirely defenceless, started to walk backwards from the bear, at the same time keeping his eyes fixed upon him. After getting a good distance from Bruin he started to run, the bear at the same time giving chase. He was chased for about three hundred yards, when on looking back he saw the bear close upon him. He then started to run around a tree with the bear after him, when a limb in a tree near by broke and fell down. This frightened Bruin who immediately stopped, and Mr. Page seizing the opportunity again took to his heels. The bear again gave chase and followed him till he got to the clearing, when the animal stopped. When Mr. Page reached the house he was completely exhausted. A number of men started in pursuit of the bear, but he has not been captured.—[Shelburne Economist.

THE FARM.

Malpe Sugar Matters.

A good many are thinking that possibly the run of sap is not so much an upward flow as was supposed. Some now liken it to a pressure of sap from all sides, there to be a reservoir of sap, so to speak, in the wood; and when we sever the pores of the wood, the pressure from all sides causes the run. If this be so, then a very small hole, and possibly a very shallow one, is best.

When I was a boy a three-quarter bit was used for tapping trees, the hole made deep, and soon a second hole bored close by. Now we are down to three-eighth inch bits and inch deep holes, and no second spout, and we seem to be getting the same amount of syrup and sugar. That the quality is better is undisputed; but at the same time we are using better and costlier utensils, and far less wood to discolor sap and syrup.

Frequent collection of sap and rapid boiling are the first requisites of success in maple sugaring. Sap quickly begins to lose quality if not boiled at once, and it should be the aim of the maker to have large boiling capacity, so there shall be no large accumulations of sap on hand. A few dollars invested in an extra pan for the arch, so that the sap may be sooner boiled, and less necessity exist for night boiling would be judiciously expended.

It looks as though with metal utensils and evaporators, with continuous flow, some makers had passed the limit of actual perfection and were sacrificing color and flavor both. Water-white syrup will not sell without a suspicion that it has been "stuffed" with white sugar, as our makers found out last season. A beautiful amber tint is wanted, and it should be the makers' aim to keep as close as possible to natural tints and flavors, and not attempt improvements upon Nature and her gifts.

The plan of canning syrup is always up for discussion, and both hot and cold plans are advocated. If it were not for a slight deposit in the cans, I should favor canning hot at the evaporator. I never saw syrup that had become cold and was then reheated but had lost a per cent. of its fine flavor and had its color darkened. For home use, when a little silica sand in the bottom of the can is not to bring the charge of "sanding," there is no other way so nice. The syrup can be thoroughly strained through double thicknesses of flannel, and will be strictly pure. If cans are filled absolutely full, cold-filled will keep all right especially if the temperature be uniform at about 45°.

The wholesale adulteration practised by city dealers, using a good deal of glucose syrup with a very little fine maple syrup as a flavor, should be circumvented in some way, for it weakens the market to the farmers' disadvantage. If makers would deal as much as possible with consumers, and as nearly as they can with commission houses who will not deal in adulterated goods, a great gain would be made, for this would tend to restore confidence in the purity of the syrup and bring more satisfactory prices.

Management of Young Lambs.

The sooner the young lambs are docked, and the males are emasculated, the easier the operations may be performed. We have been in the habit of going through the flock once a week with a pair of sharp sheep shears, and clipping the tails and castrating by one single clip. The lamb is held under the left arm, and the skin of the tail is slipped up toward the root with the fingers of this hand; the tail is then clipped off with the sheers. A pinch of powdered blue-stone (sulphate of copper), is put on the wound, and the wool is drawn down and matted together with the little blood which escapes. Nothing more is required, and the wound heals quickly. the lamb evincing no indications of suffering. It is best to cut the tail about two inches from the root, so as to leave sufficient of it to escape injury if the stump does not heal favorably, and the joint next to the cut sloughs off; this, however, rarely happens if the shears are clean, and at the same time sharp.

Live Stock in April.

Bathe the horses, shoulders with cold water or brine as quick as the collars come off, before the sweat begins to dry, and rub off the collars and saddle pieces with a moist cloth. This will prevent sore shoulders. All changes of food should be gradual, but in proportion to the work. Heavily taxed muscles make demands on the stomach; hence, increase the feed after work begins—never in anticipation. A horse fed up before he is called to work gets soft and fat. Be careful to protect horses from drafts when warm; rub down, blanket, or let them stand in close stables. Cows at calving need little care, the less the better if in a loose box or the open field. "Fussing" over them is always provocative of injury. Give no grain, but a loosening diet of bran and roots for some days, and gradually increase feed as feverish symptoms pass away. Keep calves growing thriftily; skim-milk with a little linseed meal scalded and added to it as a substitute for cream, is just as good for them as whole milk fed from the pail. Sheep must be kept in dry yards or there will be danger to their feet. Ewes with lambs should have grain daily, at least until they come to pasture. Swine.—Those who buy young pigs for feeding should buy none but half-bloods by the Berkshire, Yorkshire, Poland or other pure stre. They grow faster and fatten with less feed. Poultry.—Reduce the stock of fowls as soon as this year's hatch is well provided for, but hold on to old turkeys and old geese, they get used to the ways of the farm and are worth much more as breeders than young ones. Ducks also are good till three years old. A turkey is in her prime at five, and a geese at twenty.

Anecdotes of Great Men.

BY THE REV. W. S BLACKSTOCK.

Dr. Samuel Johnson, though a lover of anecdotes, did not set a high value upon many of the tales which are told about great men. He doubted the utility of a story, the only effect of which is to make the subject of it appear ridiculous. Even when these narratives were strictly true he could not see that it was worth while to put them on record. "I know not well," said he, in an essay written in defence of anecdotes, "what advantage posterity can receive from the one circumstance by which Tickell has distinguished Addison from the rest of mankind—the irregularity of his pulse; nor can I think myself overpaid for the time spent in reading the life of Malherbe by being enabled to relate, after the learned biographer, that Malherbe had two predominant opinions; one that the looseness of a single woman might destroy all her boast of ancient descent; the other that the French beggars made use very improperly and barbarously of the phrase noble gentleman, because either word included the sense of both."

It is probable that he would have been even severer in his strictures on these collectors of anecdotes, if he could have foreseen what would be made of some of the incidents of his own life. Without these anecdotes, however, posterity would not have had a complete picture of the man; and, on the whole, even those who have most respect for his memory do not regret that they have been preserved and handed down to succeeding generations. Happily he had great qualities enough to render it unnecessary for his weaknesses and faults to be overlooked and forgotten. A less brilliant luminary than the sun would be dimmed and disfigured by the spots which he bears upon the surface; but his transcendent effulgence makes us unconscious of their presence.

Macaulay praises Boswell's biography of Johnson, but he does it at the expense of the judgment of its author. He appears to have been of the opinion that with a sounder and more vigorous understanding he would not have done as good work. Indeed he seems to have come to the conclusion that in order to be a first rate biographer a man must be a half-fool. But if the aim of the biographer should be to produce a true picture of the subject which he undertakes to delineate, as well as of the principal events of his life, one would think to succeed in this sort of work would require the very highest qualities of authorship; and the man who, confessedly, has produced the very best biography which has been written in modern times deserves a more favourable verdict from mankind than that which has been pronounced upon him by the great essayist and historian.

I confess I do not altogether like the account that Boswell gives of Johnson's eating; and yet without that inimitable piece of description we would not have been able to see him as he really was. Those protruding, near-sighted eyes brought down to within two or three inches of his plate; those veins standing out like whipcords upon his brow glistening with perspiration; and the silent and concentrated energy with which he devoted himself to the business in hand until the cravings of the inner man were fully satisfied, though they do not, taken together, form one of the most delicate and refined pictures imaginable, are too characteristic of the man for them to have been omitted without the picture of him losing something of its truthfulness and reality. We should not have fully known the greatest Englishman of his time if this description had been left out.

I do not know how the Scotch people like the ill natured sayings of Johnson respecting themselves and their country which have been preserved. He appears to have, for some occult reason that, so far as I am aware, has never been explained, formed an inveterate prejudice against Scotland and the Scotch. He could, apparently, see nothing either in "the land of mountain and of flood," or in the people who live in it at all worthy of his admiration. The country itself he pronounced "detestable," and the only ground upon which he found himself able to justify the ways of Providence in producing such a country was that "it was made for Scotchmen." Sidney Smith confessed that he would like to roast a Quaker—metaphorically I suppose, of course—and evidently it would have been just as agreeable a pastime to Johnson to roast a Scotchman in the same sense. Even in his dictionary he finds occasion to void his bile upon the North Briton. His definition of oats is well known: "A grain commonly fed to horses in England, but used as food for men in Scotland." He admitted to a Scotch gentleman that God made his country, but he took care to modify the admission by reminding him that the same great Being had made hell.

And yet it is a remarkable fact, that ought to be mentioned to the credit of the grace and good sense of the Scotch, that among no other nationality has he more ardent admirers than among those people whom he would have us believe are brought up on horsefeed. To say nothing of Macaulay and Main, both of whom are Scotchmen, Thomas Carlyle is perhaps the only man in the last generation that has fully understood Johnson, or who has been capable of duly estimating his character and worth. The rugged elements of essential manhood, the great heart, the great understanding, the iron will, and the fierce and terrible earnestness and independence which he found in this strange and wonderful man, made the modern Diogenes forget his faults and foibles. He does not hesitate, therefore, to give him a permanent place among the heroes whom he recommends to the worshipping attention of mankind.

There is just one scene in the life of Johnson, which, as it appears to me, might better have been forgotten. His unfortunate rencountre with Adam Smith, the account of which has been preserved by Sir Walter Scott, was scarcely creditable to either one or the other of these worthies. Johnson called Smith a liar, and Smith responded by calling Johnson a son of a—well not of a respectable woman. "On such terms," says Sir Walter, "did these two great moralists meet and part; and such was the classical dialogue between these two great teachers of morality." This is very sad indeed, and I for one could have wished that when Scott's account of it was written, that like Sterne's recording angel, he had dropped a tear upon it and blotted it out forever. Highly reprehensible as the conduct of these two great men unquestionably was on that occasion, it is not conceivable that it formed an essential part of the character of either one or the other of them, or that it was in any sense necessary in order to complete the picture of either of them.

On the whole, the probability seems to be that unless Mr. Astor should take him in hand, even the alchemy of modern criticism will never be able to make a fine gentleman of Johnson. But after what has been done for Lucretia Borgia there is hope that even his ferocity of manner, and his soiled linen, which gave so much offence to her sons of fastidious taste, may after all be resolved into myths. There is in the meantime enough in the greatness of the soul that was in him, the kindness of his heart, and the substantial service which he has rendered to the literature of his country—the noblest in the world—to secure for him the respect of those who think more of the substance than of the mere accidents of human character.

JUMBO AND HIS SKELETON.

He Has Been Stuffed and Will Join the Circus Again.

When Jumbo tried to knock out a freight locomotive at St. Thomas, Ont., last September, he not only made a failure of it, but got so badly mangled that he died three minutes later. If this had happened in England, the chances are that Jumbo would have been buried, the Prince of Wales would have worn crape on his arm for a while and a ton tombstone would have held him down. But Phineas Taylor Barnum knew that the American people would never forgive him if he let Jumbo slip out of sight in that way. He wrote to Professor Henry A. Ward of Rochester and asked him if he would set the big elephant up in such shape that everybody who had ever seen him bossing things in a circus procession would know him at once. So since October last Professor Ward and four of his men have been at work on the reproduction. It is now finished.

A tawny haired poet named Tody Hamilton guided six young New York citizens to Rochester to see the elephant. They drove through blizzards to Professor Ward's big museum on top of a high hill to take a look at it. Professor Ward met the elephant hunters half way and led them toward a big yellow building that looked like a locomotive round house. He threw open a wide door, and standing on a thick oaken truck, and filling up half the house, with a jovial smile wreathing his tremendous trunk into a gigantic hook, there was Jumbo as natural looking as could be.

When the Canadian locomotive got through having fun with Jumbo, he was not much more than a heap of poker chips and cold meat. There were 1,538 pounds of elephant hide around the wreck, and it was with this that the Professor set about building up a new Jumbo. After the skin had been thoroughly tanned by two month's soaking in arsenic and corrosive sublimate of lime, it was ready for a mounting. When the hide arrived at Rochester Prof. Ward began to make a model to mount it on. On a foundation of nine-inch oak beams he planted eight standards of two-inch wrought iron. Two of these were to form the core of each leg, which was then built out with wood.

With the aid of a life photograph and an elaborate scale of measurement, made long before Jumbo's death, the builder was able faithfully to reproduce Jumbo's giant form in wood. This frame he hammered and chiseled and planed until it looked like an elephant with his coat off on a hot day. Then began the task of laying on the skin. Every wrinkle was replaced exactly as it used to be when Jumbo wore it, and all the cruel rents made by the locomotive were so carefully mended that his own mother couldn't have found them. It took 74,480 Swedish iron nails to fasten it all on, and it now fits him better than it ever did before.

The way in which Jumbo's mild brown eyes are imitated in glass would delight a poet's heart and make him tune up his lyre for all it was worth. C. A. Akeley and W. J. Critchidy, two young men who knew all about building elephants, gave Professor Ward lots of valuable help.

As it stands on its platform the new elephant weighs over 6,000 pounds and is as solid as a rock. It is so braced that all the travel and knocking around in the world cannot damage it. During circus hours Jumbo redivivus will be saddled and children will ride around the ring on his back like they used to when he was alive. Between the performances he will ride from town to town in a specially constructed car. He is the biggest job a taxidermist ever worked on.

The chalk white skeleton of Jumbo stood a few feet away. The mounting of it was the biggest problem in articulation that Professor Ward ever tackled. Every bone in its colossal framework has not only been made to keep its proper place, but the whole is made so strong that it will be able to bear all the knocking about and rough handling, by land and sea, that falls to the lot of a skeleton in the circus business. Professor Ward is authority for the statement that it is the only mounted skeleton of an adult African elephant in this country, and at the same time the largest skeleton, of a modern terrestrial mammal in the world. Stuffed Jumbo and Jumbo's skeleton are the most gigantic specimens of the naturalist's art that the American public has ever had a chance to gaze on.

Barkeeper—What's yours?

Cautious Customer—I was thinking of taking a glass of ice water, but I read the other day that nearly all this season's crop of ice had worms in it.

Barkeeper (stiffly)—Haven't heard that, sir.

Customer—It's a fact, I assure you. I'll take a glass of ice water if you'll put in something poisonous to kill the worms.

Barkeeper—What shall I put in?

Customer (after reflection)—Whisky will do.

It is said that the head of a great dry-goods store in Paris, M. Jaluzot, was about to marry recently a lady of high position and noble family. He requested the head of the Orleans family, the Comte de Paris, to serve as a witness. This answer is about the most unpopular statement that the Comte de Paris, who pretends to be something of a democrat, could have sent to a Frenchman.

At the death of the Prince his creditors immediately besieged the unfortunate Princess, who, to protect herself, was obliged to declare herself a bankrupt. Her health broke down under this strain.

Miss Bradden and her husband, Mr. Maxwell, says a correspondent, are familiar figures at the Princess and also the Lyceum Theatre on the first nights. The lady is in the prime of mature womanhood. Her hair has taken on a partial frost. Her face is a ruddy one, suggesting a comfortable English matron, mother of a numerous family, rather than one of the most prolific writers of the day. She wears a pretty lace cap and carries around with her a decidedly comfortable, good housewife atmosphere. Her figure is buxom and of traditional English build. She is not a handsome woman, save when she talks, and then her face is full of marvellous expressiveness, and she has bright sparkling eyes and a strangely sweet smile.

YOUNG FOLKS.

When the Arctic Ice Breaks Up.

BY FREDERICK SCHWATKA.

An ocean channel in the arctic [illegible] the winter is rather hard to describe. [illegible] imagine the ice we have on a large [illegible] home to be some seven or eight [illegible] ness. Then in this thick ice [illegible] number of large dry-goods boxes [illegible] of dry-goods boxes interspersed [illegible] there with small cottages, and [illegible] a two-story house, and have all [illegible] whitewashed to represent snow, [illegible] will not have a very bad representation of an arctic channel of ice when covered with snow. All these large and small [illegible] tuberances, which give the parts [illegible] are resting the name of "hummocky" [illegible] are the ice-blocks from the year before [illegible] did not melt during the short summer, [illegible] got frozen in when the new sheet of ice [illegible] formed in the early winter. This [illegible] be floating hither and thither, [illegible] "ice packs" and "ice fields" of which [illegible] read in polar literature, and when the [illegible] cold-snap of coming winter caught it, [illegible] it froze in the "ice-flo;" to remain [illegible] the winter and break up again next [illegible] mer.

In the spring of the year, from the [illegible] June to the 1st of July, according to [illegible] cality, the snow on this ocean channel [illegible] melts, and the worst trouble a [illegible] has in crossing it is the fresh water in the [illegible] lakes and ponds on top of the salt water. This lasts but a few days, draining off [illegible] the tide-cracks and seal-holes, and [illegible] water ice is exposed to the rays of the [illegible] setting sun. Wherever the ice is a [illegible] darker color, or near shore where there [illegible] the banks has blown out on it, it melts [illegible] idly. I have seen a kelpstock of blue [illegible] out down through the ice some six feet [illegible] fore the ice broke up, the channel [illegible] being but two or three inches wide [illegible] disappeared. Thus the great sheet of [illegible] ice melts unequally, and when some [illegible] storm springs up about this period of the [illegible] istence, it is broken into pieces and [illegible] drifting around as ice-packs and [illegible] fields.

On the 24th of July, 1879, we were [illegible] ing on the ice of Victoria Channel in the Arctic Sea. It was very rotten and [illegible] combed with seams here and there, [illegible] was evident that it would go to pieces [illegible] first storm. The sledge rose and fell [illegible] rough surface like a ship in the storm, [illegible] when the day's work was over I went [illegible] to see my Esquiman dog-driver, Tookoo [illegible] get in to the shore safely with the dogs and [illegible] sledge, for a storm was coming up in the well-known bad quarter, and to be on [illegible] the ice when it broke up, [illegible] the [illegible] cakes commenced rolling over each other was certain death to a puny man caught in such a fearful predicament. We pitched our little tent and crawled into it. [illegible] noon of that day, the water came [illegible] to our tent, I ran out to view the [illegible] ation, and found that my worst fears were realized. Every where the [illegible] erous blocks of the broken ice, some [illegible] as houses, were in terrible motion, [illegible] and falling, tumbling and grinding [illegible] each other in a thundering roar upon [illegible] that made the loudest commands inaudible at a few paces. Great fields of ice, [illegible] ing acres in extent, would be lifted high in the air by the driving mass, and break by its own weight send blocks of ice [illegible] as cabins spinning over the whitened surface, crushing every thing in their [illegible] while the terrible splashing of the waters sending geyser spouts aloft, was driven in fine spray before the shrieking gale, [illegible] ping all these warring forces of nature in a weird light that added a mysterious sublimity to the appalling scene before us.

Perched high on a newly made hummock as if it had climbed there to look for means of escape, was the half loaded sledge in imminent danger of being upset. My hands turned out in a twinkling and the aeronautical carriage was soon safely moored. Thus ended sledging, on the 24th of July, until the coming winter's ice should form, or about the middle of September, less than two months.

Could not Help Thinking.

There was once a little girl who became tired of thinking her own thoughts. So she went out of doors and sat down on a stone and said to herself, "Now I will not think any more. I'll just stop thinking."

But, to her great surprise, she went on thinking harder and harder and faster. Nothing she could do would stop it. She sang, she skipped, she chased the butterflies, she waded in the brook. But all the while the thinking went on, faster than the brook or the butterflies, never stopping for a single instant.

Then she began to cry, finding how helpless she was, and that she must still go on thinking, whether she wanted to or not. But that did no good either. So she began to laugh.

It was so funny that she must keep thinking as long as she lived. Although they were her own thoughts she could not stop them any more than she could stop her roses from blooming in June.

Since neither she nor anybody else could help thinking she could think only happy and pleasant thoughts. She found out that this was the only power she had over her own thoughts. She could not put any to them. But she could choose what they should be like, whether kind or unkind, merry or sad.

Archæological Find in Egypt.

It pur... ...be the tomb of a certain prince of ...l lower Egypt, who lived in the ...time Neferkara, and who is repre... ...one of the wall paintings as a ...leaning on a crutch. A fine shrine and an altar occupy their original position in the innermost chamber, and are in perfect condition.

The sculptures are very curious, and the aspect of the whole tomb is reported as extremely archaic. From the second to the end of the eleventh dynasty there were, however, many kings named Neferkara; and until the inscriptions are fully deciphered it is impossible to say under which ruler this lame functionary flourished. The tomb is attributed by those on the spot to the third dynasty; but it seems for many reasons more likely to date from the time of that Neferkara who succeeded Merenra of the sixth dynasty. The founder of this line, Ati, was a native of the island of Elephantine, opposite Assouan, and the place first rose to importance under his successors. It was during the reign of Merenra that Una, a famous General and Prime Minister, quarried the granite of Assouan for the sepulchre and sarcophagus of his sovereign, and built a fleet of thirteen vessels at Elephantine for the transport of the same. Pending further details, we should therefore be inclined to ascribe the large tomb to a gentleman of that period, especially if the neighboring twelfth dynasty tombs are those of his descendants. In one of these latter there were found a series of Osiride statues, representing the deceased in mummied form, done in baked clay or terra cotta, and placed in recesses along the corridor. This, at all events, is an entire novelty in tomb decoration.

The cemetery will probably prove to be of great extent, as there is evidence of its having been in use down to a late period. The large tomb, usurped by later comers, was found piled to the ceiling with mummies, mummy cases, and funerary furniture of Roman times, including upward of sixty memorial stelæ. Gen. Grenfell is actively pursuing his work of discovery by the help of our English soldiers, who continue to open and clear out tomb after tomb.

Dr. Phipson, in a German scientific journal, advocates the general use of sugar as an article of diet, not simple as a pleasing addition to food. He affirms that during forty years he has eaten at least a quarter of a pound of sugar daily, not counting sugar-forming substances taken at the same time, and has been benefitted by it.

THE idea that the termini of the C. P. R. shall be Liverpool and Hong Kong has taken hold in Britain. Truth's statement that the imperial government has decided to subsidize a line of steamers from British Columbia to Chinese and Australian ports may be premature, but it undoubtedly casts the shadow of the British mind. Britain can and will afford to pay a million pounds sterling for the purposes which the proposed subsidy will subserve. There is no longer any question of the C. P. R's. importance as a Canadian work. Its importance as an imperial work is beginning to be understood.

IT is just a question that the Irish man will accept Gladstone's scheme to drive him out of Westminster and out of English politics, and confine his great energy for agitation to Ireland. Paddy rather likes going to London, raising a dust there, interrupting English legislation, and generally making himself obnoxious to the Saxon. And what will the American Irishmen think of it? Antagonism to Britain, as much as love of Ireland, is a mainspring of their activity over this question. Will the dollars they now contribute to the cause go hereafter to the true advancement of the interests of the people of Ireland, or will they still be directed to keeping up the agitation against England?

FROM the following paragraph in the Rochester Democrat, our citizens will be pleased to learn that Rev. J. E. Allen is winning good opinions on the other side:—"The Ladies' Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal church, of Marion, is furnishing a fine course of lectures. The first by Pastor Allen, upon "The Cranks of Creation," illustrating his great elocutionary, dramatic and instructive powers. The lecture well deserves the high comments by Canada, Buffalo and Canandaigua newspapers. The second was given on the 24th by Rev. A. J. Barthop, of Hopewell, N. Y., a former colleague of Mr. Allen in the far Northwest, upon "The Great Loan Land." It was a most vivid picturing by word, maps and diagrams prepared by the speaker, of the to us almost unknown, grand "New Northwest," Manitoba, Assiniboine, Alberta, Saskatchewan, etc. If Her Majesty's Dominion can spare us such men, ministers and lecturers as Messrs. Allen and Barthop, she is welcome to all our defaulters and their spoils. The third lecture by Bishop Ives, is eagerly anticipated."

And They Did.

He had been courting his Sarah Ann for many a year. The blushing girl had become a mature woman, with a hint of crow's feet and faded hair, Azariah; as he was about to leave her one evening, sympathetically remarked: "Sarah Ann, I bought a lot in the graveyard to-day, that we may lay our bones alongside of each other at last."

Sarah Ann insinuately rejoined "Azariah, can't we lay our bones alongside of each other while we live?"

Why do we Have Eggs at Easter.

Easter is observed among all Christain people as the anniversary of the great event of the resurrection of Christ. He was dead, but returned to life. The eggs is taken as emblematic of a return to life. It is to all appearance dead, but we know that if placed under proper conditions, life will come forth from it. The use of eggs at Easter was adopted from an usage older than our era. It was the custom in very early times to celebrate the return of spring by making presents of eggs.

"Why does not Easter always fall upon a fixed day. Christmas is always on December 25th, why should not Easter be fixed with equal certainty?" Easter must always be on Sunday. It is not a particular date that is observed, but a particular Sunday. How to decide upon the Sunday, gave the very early churches much trouble, and there were differences on that account, but the matter was settled at a council held at Nice, in the year 325. The rule was adopted that: "Easter day is always the first Sunday after the full moon, which happens upon or next after March 21st, and if the full moon happens on a Sunday, Easter day is the next Sunday after. This gives Easter day a wide range of dates, as it may occur on any Sunday from March 22nd to April 25th.—[American Agriculturist for April.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Afflictions, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. NOYES, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, N. Y.

This is to certify that I have used McGregor's Speedy Cure for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint, and do honestly say that if it cost me one hundred ($100.00) a bottle I would not be without it, as it has done me more good than all the medicines I ever used, and I feel like a new man.—Yours truly, ALEX. STEEL, Carleton Place, Ont. This medicine is for sale at 50c. and $1.00 per bottle at R. L. Stephen's Drug Store. 1

THE FARM.

Poultry.

Meat is expensive, but it pays to feed it. It is the best material that can be used for stimulating egg production, and many hens remain unprofitable for the want of it.

Breeders, like nurserymen, prefer to raise and sell new things. They can obtain higher prices for them, as they are desired by amateurs, while they have little competition.

A Bantam lays a larger egg in proportion to size than any other class of fowls, and for food consumed yields as large profits as do the larger breeds. They are excellent as pets for the children, and usually educate the little ones to a knowledge of keeping poultry.

No man can tell what sex the egg will produce. In fact, it is almost impossible to tell, after the chicken is hatched, until the comb and tail begin to grow. It seems safe to assume that the rules for determining the sex of eggs will be monopolized by "scientific amateurs."

The favorite egg for setting appears to be as nearly oval as possible. The best breeders reject every pointed or irregular egg, or a very large one. It is customary to pick out the eggs very carefully in breeding fine stock. Generally eighty per cent are rejected as liable to produce inferior chickens.

When the farmer attempts to hatch thousands of chicks the most discouraging spectacle is the apparently great mortality that occurs. He becomes appalled and wonders how the "old hen" can be so successful, while the brooders seem to fail. But let him reflect and apply the standard of eight chicks raised from ten hatched, and make his comparison. Supposing, for illustration, that she was capable of hatching 5000 she would lose 1000. Hence with the use of incubators we may hatch 5000 chicks, suffer a loss of 1000 and be, proportionately, at par with the hen that hatches ten chicks and raises eight.

We believe in forcing the hens to their utmost, and getting as large profits as possible in the shortest space of time. The cow brings forth only one young in a year, while the hen is capable of laying enough eggs to fill her place with fifty pullets, which require but half a year of growth to be made serviceable. Hence, to force the hens means to supply them with all the elements necessary for producing eggs, as well as a variety for the promotion of health and vigor. It means warm, dry quarters, clean water, ground food, and opportunities for exercise.

A dozen of the largest eggs have been found to weigh twenty-four ounces, while a dozen of the smaller ones of the same stock weighed only 14½ ounces. The fair average weight to the dozen is about 32½ ounces. About one-third of the entire weight may be regarded as nitrogenous and nutritive matter; a greater proportion than that of meat, which is rated at only about 25 to 28 per cent, while the nutritive part of the oyster is only about 12 per cent. If a pound of eggs, therefore, should be valued at 22 cents, a pound of beef would be worth 24 to 28 cents, and a pound of oysters 12 cents.

The editor of the Farm, Field and Fireside, says: "We have realized as much as $5 from a single hen, and as the hen was valued at only fifty cents, the gross sum derived was equal to one thousand per cent. And we have also known of flocks that gave a net profit of $7 each. But the conditions were favorable. The hens were fed regularly; they were supplied with all that they required; they were carefully sheltered, and kept warm, dry and comfortable; had unrestricted range, and consequently were contented and happy, secured plenty of exercise, and were capable of assisting themselves whenever the proper conditions of food were overlooked by the owners.

Run Down by Infernal Dogs.

After this when dogs chase my sheep every one run down or heated will be disposed of without delay. A number of years ago dogs killed and scattered a flock of Merinos, and we kept all that lived. It took some of them two years to die, but die they did, and as they pined so long I examined them and found that they lived as long as they had any lungs. Two years ago the dogs chased and bit a number of a flock of course-wooled lambs. None died, but several of them have not done well since. They are poor this winter in spite of all we could do, and I am sure their lungs are affected, the same as the Merinos were. They really have consumption, and in time will die of this disease, caused by overheating and congestion of the lungs at the time the dogs chased them. They were so tired out that they did not eat for several days, but lay quiet in the stable where they were taken when found. The Merinos hid in the underbrush in the woods and were there three days after being hunted down by the dogs. It is a folly to attempt to keep sheep under such circumstances and get anything out of them. As soon as they have cooled off they should be slaughtered. They will not gain in condition and food is wasted upon them.

Timely Suggestions.

Hogs often become covered with ticks and lice. If a little sulphur is fed in their feed occasionally it will entirely rid the swine of these pests. Often the hogs are covered with these parasites when the owner would not suspect it from the appearance of the animals, and consequently it is always well to examine them closely occasionally, so as to be sure they have no such tax on their vitals, to steal away what should go toward making growth and flesh.

The treatment of warts is to pare the hard and dry skin from their tops, and then touch them with the smallest drop strong acetic acid, taking care that the acid does not run off the wart upon the neighboring skin, for if it does it will occasion inflammation and much pain. If this practice be continued once or twice daily, with regularity, paring the surface of the wart when it gets hard and dry, the wart may be soon effectually cured.

Some figures of speech: "Gentlemen of the jury," said an Irish barrister, "it will be for you to say whether this defendant shall be allowed to come into court with unblushing footsteps, with the cloak of hypocrisy in his mouth, and draw three bullocks out of my client's pocket with impunity."

THAT OTHER BOY.

BY MRS. JULIA M'NAIR WRIGHT.

For every light, a corresponding shadow; for every good, its counterpart of evil; for every son in a family, that other boy, who is nobody's boy; for every boy in a home, the homeless boy.

What is this vagrant, unowned boy? He is the making of the future tramp, criminal, pauper; a burden and a terror to the community, able to undo all the good your boy may grow up to accomplish.

Where is this boy of the dangerous classes? In a hovel attic, cellar, a staying place dominated by a drunken father, by a drunken or ignorant, or reckless mother; he is an orphan, allowed a crust and a shelter by criminals, who hope to use him in crime when he is a little older; he is a poorhouse; he is bound out to some irresponsible party, who regards him as so much muscular force, ignoring the fact that he has a mind and a soul; he is, perhaps, a little higher in the social scale, with parents and a home, but the parents "let him run," have no idea of governing or counselling him; the home offers him no attractions; he goes to school when he likes, plays truant when he pleases; races the streets at night, hangs about corners, groceries, bar-rooms, never goes to church or Sunday-school, swears, plays for keeps, and knows the taste of beer and brandy; he is a rich man's boy, perhaps; his mother pays no heed to him, his father sets him a bad example, ruffians decoy him, he has too much money in his pocket, and is just as surely set on the road to end "black-leg" as the boy from the slums. In this last case, as in the others, he is really "nobody's boy," for to have merely begotten or brought forth a child is not to be a parent in any proper sense of that potent word.

What is to become of this multudinous nobody's boy germ of the mob? If society does not speedily rise up and master the mob, the mob is bound to master society. We must dominate our criminals now, or we shall be presently destroyed by them. But how shall we do this? Mere force is not the remedy; irons, stone walls, an army of policemen will not meet the case. France had once a Bastile and an army as ready to fire on Jacques as on Hans. But the Bastile crumbled suddenly, the army fraternized with the mob, there was a revolution, above which, sole landmark, rose the guillotine, pouring forth a river of blood.

Mobs and criminal classes are to be managed successfully only by moral means, and moral means can only be applied successfully when the mob is in embryo, the plastic state of boyhood.

Nobody's boy is the danger of our future; we can and must make him the corner-stone in the fabric of our hope. But how to do this? Whatever our boy needs, nobody's boy needs. What will make our boy good, safe, reliable, will make that other boy safe, reliable, good. All that we give our boy of encouragement, of fortunate prejudices, of moral environment, we should give nobody's boy. We must make up to him of his disastrous lack of home, of parents, of moralities. Largely considered, this may be an affair of compulsory education of the alphabet and the ten commandments insisted upon for every one; of no vagrants and State-schools for industrial arts; but there are outgoings of the question too large for the present article. We prefer the simple and practical. That village is clean where every villager sweeps well about his own door-stone. If every neighborhood solved the problem of its own neglected, vagrant, destitute boys, the problem of the country at large would straightly find its solution.

Let us drop the consideration of the great centers, the cities, for the moment, unless they may choose to share in these simple hints for the towns, villages, rural districts. We can not expect to entirely segregate our boy from nobody's boy. We must not be so fearful of exposing our boy to the other boy's precocious evil, that we devote ourselves merely to separating them, as far as possible. Their lives will lap somewhere; let us arrange the meeting point where it will do the one good and the other no harm. No wise, sober, respectable, useful family should rest easy one hour, so long as within the reach of their influence is any lad left to evil influences, or no influences at all; for, in this last case, the evil will come in fast enough.

Here is not a matter of collecting funds, establishing costly libraries, reading-rooms, and so on. Good indeed are these when one can come to them, but the thing is to begin at once, and to bring personal influences to bear on the personal boy.

The primary danger to nobody's boy is from intemperance. All that our boy needs to develop temperance prejudice and principle, the other boy needs. Canvass the neighborhood for him, bring him to a temperance society, buy him a badge and a pledge card. It costs little to get together ten, fifteen, twenty boys of the neighborhood, in some clean, bright kitchen or dining-room well lit and warmed, to talk temperance, sing it, tell temperance riddles, read stories, speak pieces and end up with a plate of ginger cakes or a basket of apples. The effect will be beyond mere opinions concerning beer and alcohol. You will find these boys going to school more regularly, that they may read and speak better; you will find them coming to the meeting with clean hands and shoes, with brushed hair and clothes; their voices will moderate, their language will be cleaner and civiler.

I remember a neighborhood numbering forty or fifty boys, from eight to sixteen years. One lady established such a temperance society at her home as I have mentioned; badges, pledge cards, leaflets, gingerbread, cost about $5 or $6 a year. The other lady collected all the books she could beg in the neighborhood from friends or from religious societies, raised a subscription of $20 and bought some more books, turned one of her rooms into a circulating library, chatted with the boys on Saturday afternoons when they came for books, helped them choose, helped them think, and in eighteen months the boys of that locality were new creatures. They were superior boys—mannerly, intelligent, enterprising—not the making of a rascal among the whole of them.

If there are only three boys in a neighborhood given to running the streets at night, those three should be looked after. If there are ten, twenty, fifty, who loaf about, all the more need to provide for them. Follow them up, speak to them, encourage them, interest yourself in them. What, clothes dirty and ragged? Find them work that will buy a new suit. Get some one to make work if there is none ready. Make it a personal favor to you that they should come to your church and sit in your pew or your class in Sunday-school, or to your home and borrow a book. Don't worry them with dull books; consider the stuff you are dealing with. Save up all your papers, especially illustrated, to give them. Make a huge scrap book for them to look over, treat them, as Italians say, in fiesta, a cookie, a glass of milk or lemonade, an apple; stand treat cheerfully. Where is the neighborhood where some empty room cannot be found, and where, among all the neighbors, a table or two, a few chairs, a condemned stove, a few pictures, some window shades, can not be begged or borrowed; where some books, magazines, papers, can not be contributed; where some genial father can not make a few packages of jack-straws, two or three fox-and-geese boards, a box or so of letters to play games of words, a little stationery for who would write a letter? Do you know if such a place is open for the loafing boys, they will stop loafing; they will make the fire and sweep and scrub the room by turns, and will refrain from swearing and spitting on the floor, and will avail themselves of the wash-bowl, cake of soap and towel set forth in entry or corner? Then with one good friend or another to keep the peace evening after evening, and detail wonders of natural science, or stories of adventure, or mighty deeds of history; to lay bare the many-sided evils of strong drink, and sketch the bright fortunes of honest enterprise and industry, the horizons of these neglected lives will widen, they will breathe purer airs. Nobody's boy will feel that he can be the son of his own deeds, and the father of his own fortunes; his dormant manhood will awake and his nescient brutehood will be eliminated, and the communistic rabies of the nineteenth century will die with the century, as died with the earlier centuries that scourge, the black plague.

Finally, to sum up, whenever there is a boy neglected, pressed by evil example, responsible to nobody, there is work for the nearest person whose eyes fall upon him, work for which that person is responsible to God, the country, the community.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

When the meeting had been opened in due form Brother Gardner said he desired to call the attention of the meeting to the following circular recently issued by the keeper of the museum:

To the public: "The Lime-Kiln Club Museum now contains about 4,000 relics, ranging in interest from the sword of Bunker Hill to the jack-knife of John Quincy Adams. We have room for at least 2,000 more, and are making an earnest effort to build up something which will live after us. If you have anything in the nature of a relic which you are willing to part with we will receive it with grateful hearts. We sadly need another skull of Nero, and can make room for any old boots belonging to Plato, spades or shovels used by Diogenes, or shot-guns with the name of Cæsar engraved on the breech. We are the only museum in this country which accepts relics as marked and swear by 'em forever after."

INFORMATION WANTED.

Sir Isaac Walpole wanted some information. He had been looking over the annual report of the Detroit Police Board, and had noted the fact that, out of over 7,000 arrests during the year, there were only four Africans. However, when it came to colored people born in the United States the figures were 453. Did this go to show that civilization corrupted the colored man? Didn't it give a black eye to the generally accepted theory that the better a colored man was educated the higher above crime would he soar? He would like the views of the President on the matter.

"My theory in regard to your figgers am dis," replied Brother Gardner. "Dar' war' only fo' real ole Africans in Detroit, an' arter dese had bin run in de stock was exhausted an' de perlice had to go fur call'd Americans to fill up de gap. When only one fish-hook out of sebenteen cotches a cull'd man I doan' reckon he am slidin' down hill so worry fast."

DECLINED.

A communication was received from Prof. Wagerman, prophet and predictor, offering to furnish the Lime-Kiln Club with a spring two weeks earlier than usual in consideration of the small sum of five dollars. The Professor is a resident of St. Louis, and has predicted more dark nights during the watermelon season than any other man in America.

Giveadam Jones moved that his offer be accepted. He was getting tired of his chilblains and sighed for a rest.

Trustee Pullback hoped the motion would prevail. If he couldn't go barefoot two weeks earlier than usual this year he would have to sit in the house.

"De offer will be succulntly declined," replied the President. "I am not only agin fooling wid de weather, but if de white folks kin stand it we shouldn't let on dat it hurts us."

STATISTICAL.

Waydown Beebe said he had been thinking for some time that the club ought to take it upon itself to gather and compile certain statistics regarding the colored race of this country, and he trusted that a movement in that direction would be favorably considered.

Pickles Smith supported the idea. He wanted to know just how many colored men were hanged every year; how many left the profession of whitewashing for that of law; what number became bald-headed; how many committed suicide, and why they did it.

Several other members discussed the subject favorably, and it was finally agreed that a statistician should be appointed at an annual salary of $2. Brother Gardner announced that he would appoint Prof. Clarified Walkingbeam to the position, and instructed him to enter upon his duties at once. The salary is intended to be just sufficient to keep the Professor's hair cut close the year round. The office is distinctively honorary, and the incumbent's social position will at once be raised a good many pegs.

NO CHANCE.

Whalebone Hawker offered a resolution to the effect that the price of whitewashing be advanced ten per cent. on the 1st of May, and that the price of carpet-beating be advanced fifteen per cent.

Judge Cahiff favored the idea. Prices were now so low that a real artist could scarcely buy less pork and frost-bitten potatoes for his family.

Elder Daybell Jenkins was delighted at the idea. He lately put in two weeks freezing a ceiling in seven different whitewash colors, and his wages were less than $10. No man with any of the inspirations of the true artist in his soul could keep at his best on such wages.

"It am my opinyun," observed the President after the Elder had subsided, "dat any move jist now to increase prices will react on us. If we begin to put up de prices we shall skeer people out of de ideah of whitewashin' or takin up on'pets. When de summer has fa'ly opened dis subjick kin be brought up agin fur discushun."

NOTES.

A motion that a barrel of lemonade be placed in the hall at every meeting hereafter was voted down, and Elder Toots, who made it, was fined $11.

Judge Arbitration Smith attempted to get a resolution through the meeting declaring the accordion to be the national musical instrument of America, but received no support.

Uncle Ben Thompson wanted the meeting to express itself on the subject of a war with China, but was ordered to sit down.

The janitor reported twenty-two new leaks in the roof and fifteen in the stove, and was instructed to draw on the Treasurer for twelve cents to buy cement.

The meeting then adjourned.

How a Bachelor Makes His Couch.

It used to take him about thirty minutes to get the linen to lie perfectly smooth, it usually taking a notion to puff up and recline in a confused heap in any portion of the bed but the one he wanted. This is no longer the case. His bed he makes as well and as quickly as the most deft feminine fingers could. He has invented a plan which, being well off, he has decided not to have patented, but is willing to make public for the benefit of the rest of suffering bachelorhood. By an ingenious contrivance he has fixed heavy shot on the end of buckles, which he adjusts to each corner of the sheet, throws the sheet in air over the bed, and presto! the weights shoot out and the sheet lodges squarely and fairly in the place where it ought to be.

A Great Composer.

Mr. Dasenberry—Well, I'll admit, dear, that it was a little late when I came home. O, it was just astonishing the way he brought music out of the instrument. Being himself a great composer——

Mrs. Dasenberry—Yes, no doubt, sir. I noticed you brought a good deal of him home with you.

"Eh, my dear? A good deal of what?"

"Of the great composer. I found a half-filled flask in your pocket this morning."

AN EGYPTIAN ROMANCE.

A Story of Love and Wild Adventure, founded upon Startling Revelations in the Career of Arabi Pasha.

By the Author of "NINA, THE NIHILIST," "THE RED SPOT," "THE RUSSIAN SPY," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER LI.

THE WAR MINISTER RETURNS SOONER THAN HE'S WANTED.

Captain Donelly, notwithstanding the metamorphosis in his outward appearance, recognized his man as well as voice in the twinkling of an eye, and exclaimed joyously: "What! Pat Monaghan alive and kicking? You come as our guardian angel, my boy." "By the piper that played before Moses, I've brought ye the duds that'll help the most lot of us to get off safe."

"Pat, this is fine news," ejaculated his master. "Open your bundle and spread out your things. Though Nellie, I see, is already dressed like an Egyptian lady.

Pat still carried over his left arm such disguises as he thought would suit the denizens of the next dungeon, which he and the captain now quickly entered.

It also was deluged with the electric light, which was flashed on the arsenal almost continuously through the night, since it was known to be a signalling station, and the British admiral desired to be as well acquainted with Egyptian tactics as the Egyptians themselves.

Mr. Trezarr received Captain Donelly with considerable surprise, for Nellie had again and again told him and her mother that he was dead.

His first question, however, was after neither his wife nor daughter, but as to how the bombardment was progressing, and which side was getting the worst of it.

"I can tell you best about that," said Pat, ceremoniously. "It's all up wid the Egyptians. It'll be pace to-morrow, an' Heroic Pasha will eat humble pie, but, by this and by that, there'll be some murdering of Europeans going on to-night."

"By the by, what are your plans for our ultimate escape, Pat?" asked his master.

"Why, yer honor, when we've once got out av the house, an' desaved any sentries that may be about the yards at the back. I know where to lay my hand on a whopping big boat that'll hold the whole lot of us with ease."

"Gentlemen," said Frank Donelly, "if you will cast in your lot with us, on with these disguises that my man has brought you at once. You don't seem to have thought of weapons, Pat?"

"Bedad, and I'd enough to carry as it was. If I'd have left swords and pistols go falling about the place at every step I tuk a pretty penny they'd have made. I know where we can lay our hands on lots on 'em as soon as ever we want 'em."

Soon Mr. Trezarr and the clergyman, whose name, by the by, was Rollingstone, had Egyptianized themselves as much as, considering their pallor, it was possible to do. Nellie had brought her mother out of their own cell into the passage, so that in another minute all the party were together and looking towards Pat Monaghan as their guardian angel.

Nellie had found her missing veil, but as it was not a regular yashmack it only concealed her exquisitely lovely face in part.

She had actually persuaded her mother to don the convasse uniform, by means of the oft reiterated assurance that as the skirts of the bright blue, goldbraided frock coat were so very long and also so ample as regarded material, it took away even the faintest suspicion of indelicacy.

With her by no means abundant back hair pushed up under her tarbouch, Mrs. Trezarr looked the fat, indolent, pompous self-conceited canvasse to the very life, and no sooner did her husband's gaze rest upon her than, notwithstanding his evident terror and the extreme hazard of their situation, his lips expanded for a moment into a broad grin, while even the Reverend Rollingston uttered a spasmodic "God bless my soul!"

But Pat turning sharply round, whispered: "Let every one pray for himself an' the Blessed Virgin for us all, for in that way God Almighty will hear us an' the Egyptians won't."

Having uttered this adjuration, Pat glided or rather shuffled, on in front, those whom he was attempting to save following as noiselessly as they could in his tracks, and so they quitted the subterraneans and reached the occupied rooms of the house, though they all hoped that they would not find them so on the present occasion.

But in the very first that they entered they beheld Rahib and Khassim, lying on the floor as drunk as two fools, and snoring in their sleep like a couple of angry hogs.

"Here's the room where we'll find the weapons," whispered Pat Monaghan, and he already had his grasp on the door handle when a confused hubbub, the shuffling of many feet, the sound of angry and excited voices, yells of "Rahib! Khassim!" and the opening and slamming of doors seemed to take away his presence of mind in an instant, and then, before Captain Donelly could push to the front, into the very apartment walked the war minister, closely followed by at least a score of evidently half maddened Mohammedans, the majority of whom grasped a blood-reeking sword, whilst not a few held cocked pistols in their left hands.

They had arrived too quickly even for the little party of Europeans to sell their lives at a satisfactory price.

Naught remained for them but to be slaughtered like sheep.

CHAPTER LII.

UNARMED YET MENACED BY A SCORE OF SWORDPOINTS.

Slaughtered like sheep they would have been but for Arabi Pasha himself.

Despite the disguises he recognized the entire party with the exception of Pat Monaghan, and he came to the very rational conclusion that the thoroughly well-disguised Irishman was one of his own people whom the Feringhee by dint of threats had frightened into serving them.

Against the Europeans his rage knew no bounds.

Causing his followers to recoil by a single wave of his sword, the only one that seemed to be clear, bright and unstained, he addressed Mr. Trezarr with:

"So you are anxious to shake the dust of Egypt from your feet? You are desirous to desert what you think to be a tottering and lost cause for a prosperous and triumphant one? You want to cheat me of the wife whom only a few hours ago you were so eager that I should take for one? But it is a wife's duty to cling to a husband in adversity as well as in prosperity, through evil report as well as through good report. Thus your daughter shall cling unto me."

He gnashed his teeth as he concluded, and, striding forward, seized Nellie by an arm; but no sooner had he done so than, his rage and indignation getting the better of his prudence, Frank Donelly smote him in the face with all his might.

Arabi Pasha staggered, but recovered himself adroitly and the next instant the point of his sword was at the dragoon's throat, who, folding his arms on his breast, awaited death unflinchingly.

His undaunted demeanor it was that saved him, for the murderous look that had come into the war minister's eyes died out of them again and he sheathed his sword with a clash, saying:

"No, I will not be tempted into slaying a brave man, no matter how great the provocation."

"You will wrong him far more by stealing away from him his lawful wedded wife," said Frank.

"I am not conscious of doing any such thing," retorted the war minister indignantly. "Her parents declared unto me when I took her to wife that she was not yours, that it was an idle ceremony that had been performed between you. They should know, and I can hardly believe that they deliberately lied unto me, whilst, on the other hand I know that the ceremony which united us together was a holy, a solemn and a binding one according to my own creed. Thus, in my opinion, I lawfully and rightly claim her as my own, and thus do I seize upon her and give her in charge of my people."

And as he concluded Arabi Pasha once more pounced upon Nellie and this time swung her round into the arms of two of his followers, to whom he said:

"Take her out and mount her on one of the swiftest yet gentlest of our horses, and death to all who would rob me of her, for every man has a right to defend his own."

When Nellie had disappeared from view the war minister turned on her parents.

"You deserve no consideration at my hands. You are calculating, mercenary and heartless. I cannot express my contempt for you both. If you wish to accompany your daughter, for her sake you are welcome to do so."

"I wish to accompany my child, of course," said Mrs. Trezarr, in a tone and with a manner which she in vain attempted to make dignified. Her get up as a canvasse was against that, and, indeed, Arabi's fierce followers could not all of them restrain a grin.

"I, too, wish to go with my wife and child, your excellency," said Mr. Trezarr, with no attempt at dignity even, that article, if he still preserved any, having slipped down and hidden itself away in his boots.

No sooner had he thus delivered himself than the war minister, without deigning to make him and his wife any reply, shouted, addressing his followers generally:

"Take them away and mount them on quiet horses, and whilst preventing any attempt at escape, see that they come to no harm."

Whereupon the banker and his wife disappeared from view as suddenly as their daughter had done, leaving only Frank Donelly, Pat Monaghan and the clergyman to be disposed of.

Arabi Pasha did not look as though he should take long about this lot.

"You are a man of peace," he said to the minister, "so here is a safe conduct, with my seal and signature attached, which will enable you to go in peace whithersoever you may feel inclined. Have no fear, for even the fierce Bedouins, who cannot read, know the seal well enough, and your showing it will render you as safe in the streets of Alexandria, even at a time like the present, as though they were those of London. No thanks, sir, but go. The way lies open and I have no time to listen."

Mr. Rollingstone did not require to be twice bidden. He fixed the safe conduct against his head covering in such a way that the curious seal of yellow wax should be conspicuous even at a distance, and he drove a pin through both so that by no possibility should it get lost.

Then he set himself in motion as fast as a Rollingstone could do, and so disappeared in turn.

"Captain Donelly," said the war minister then, with a grim smile, "we seem destined to encounter each other at the most inopportune moments, and perhaps I never felt so tempted to cut your throat as I do at the present one. If you were only armed—"

"That can now be managed," exclaimed our hero. "Bid one of your followers to lend me a weapon and here on this spot, foot to foot and blade to blade, we will decide who is the rightful husband of the fair girl who is your prisoner."

"Allah has decided that already, through the services of the Ulema. As for your petition, it is the request of a madman and as such is refused. My life is still my country's and not my own, and there are other reasons as well."

"I call you a brave and honorable man, and I look upon you as in every way worthy of my steel. As for the safe conduct, I might as well expect you to supply me with a swift dromedary to pursue you on. I am well content to be left to my own resources, and I thank you for the life that you have not taken, even though it lay at your feet."

"Then we understand each other. Adieu until we next meet. You have been liberated, I see, by a fool, but a fool is unaccountable for his own actions, therefore Allah forbid that I should punish them. With traitors and unfaithful servants it is very different. Dispatch me these drunken dogs who are wallowing under the table."

The last words were addressed to his followers in Arabic, and the next instant there was the simultaneous report of a pair of pistols and the sleeping men's brains were blown out as they lay.

The stern yet just deed accomplished, the war minister gave the word to retire, and he and his fierce followers immediately quitted the house, leaving the dragoon captain and his faithful but disguised attendant apparently the only occupants thereof.

CHAPTER LIII.

THROUGH BURNING ALEXANDRIA AND OUT AT THE ROSETTA GATE.

"Pat," said his master, as the two passed out of the house, "tell me, in as few words as possible, how you have managed to impose upon the Egyptians so effectually as actually to get into their confidence. It might put me up to a wrinkle or two, you know."

"Bedad, yer honor, and its little that I've got to tell. You know about where ye left me. Well, the nagurs didn't think I was worth looking up; and for some reason or other seemed half afraid to kill me, and so they turned me out of doors with more kicks than ha'pence and told me to go to the devil."

"And what happened next, for I see that you did not take their advice?"

"Faith, no; for I'd found even Egypt a deal too hot for my tastes. But whin I got out into the town I might aisily have fancied myself in purgatory, and what wid de flames an' the blood an' the screeching an' throat cutting, faith, Donnybrook fair would have been a Quakers' meeting to it. I got out of the way into what looked like an empty house, for I was never the chap to thrust myself into company where I wasn't appreciated at me proper value; but hardly had I lain myself down on a sophy when an Egyptian rushed into the room with in five minutes of my laying myself down, and, luckily, before I'd time to fall asleep, and who, seeing me alone in me glory, thought, I suppose, that he'd send me to glory wid a few inches ov cold steel in me brisket. I got up quite politely to receive him, an' as his weapon was all point an' no edge, I clutched the blade, and at the end of a tussle got it away from him and then runned it through him. I took his clothes and left mine behind, an' whin I'd put on his duds, I methought me of a little bottle which I'd left in me wesket pocket, an' which I'd appropriated for better or worse at the hotel we put up at."

"If it was whiskey you wished it a larger dose, I'll be sworn, Pat."

"It was labelled Pison, an' sure it was just the remains ov what the landlord gave ye to color yer honor's face and hands with. I'd collared it against eventualities through seeing it lying neglected on the carpet in one corner whin I came in for me lady's traveling box. I'll be as good an Egyptian as any ov them now, I says to meself as I rubbed it in, an' I think yer honer will allow that I've been a better Egyptian than most?"

"But how did you get back to the arsenal, and so impose upon everybody there?"

"Och, bedad, an' that was the easiest matter of all. I shammed dumb because I knew so little of their lingo, an' I played the fool to get into their good graces. They say here that the devil makes a rogue, but God makes a fool; so they beat the one and pet and pamper the other."

"They thought you were harmless as a dove, Pat, whilst in fact you were as artful as a fox, and so they let you go about the place unwatched, getting all these disguises and so forth, thinking the while that you had no more object in assembling them than a plundering jackdaw."

"Your honor's about right, which proves that in Egypt as well as elsewhere it takes a wise man to play the fool. I only hope we'll be able to steal a pair of horses before we've done."

"We'll say 'requisition,' for it has a better sound, Pat. Well, we go into the armory after all, so that we can defend ourselves if attacked and sell our lives dearly. But horses we must obtain, for I have sworn that I will follow my stolen bride throughout the length and breadth of Egypt before I will calmly surrender her up to a Moslem like Arabi Pasha."

"Bedad, and as long as yer honor follows up the young lady, so long will I follow up yer honor. But hadn't I better play dummy again, for here we are in the public street?"

"Yes, Pat; I think you had," answered his master, and they walked on in silence a while.

Not that there seemed to be much need for such a precaution, since the whole place seemed to be deserted, save by a few wandering dogs.

No sentries were at the arsenal gates, a white flag waved from the summit of the arsenal house, and on looking down the broad thoroughfare to the left the Ras-el-Tin palace was observed to be burning fiercely, the flames leaping out of every window and even upwards through gaps in the roof.

At this moment the sound of desultory firing proved that the town was not quite empty, the evidence being confirmed by an occasional piercing shriek; but Frank Donelly guessed that the sounds were caused by those human vultures, who in all countries gather on such occasions like ravens to a feast, and who while engaged in robbing the wounded and the dead kill all who have strength enough left to struggle.

From such grim birds of prey they had little to fear, for a dozen of them would shrink away from two armed men just as a pack of wolves scamper off at the mere roar of a lion; so the two Irishmen walked on undaunted, grasping in their hands the loaded revolvers which they had appropriated from the war minister's private armory after he had taken his departure, as it now appeared, from the city itself.

Dotting the vast place in all directions were bodies of murdered Europeans, and on the pavement outside the Ottoman Bank they lay in heaps and in number to certainly upwards of a hundred, some with their throats cut, others with their heads slashed entirely off, nearly all with their limbs gashed or cleft in twain, and their trunks disfigured by many a hideous and vengeful wound. Women as well as men had been served thus, and even many little children, and Frank Donelly's blood boiled within him as he beheld the cruel sight, which, in truth, affected Pat almost as much as his master.

But whilst regarding it the latter heard a sound that at once attracted his attention.

"Arrah, yer honor, it's in luck we are. There are horses calling to us from inside the corner of the garding on our right. They are surely picketed just under those carob trees."

"Come along and we'll soon see, Pat. If they are there we'll at once confiscate them."

They entered the garden through the wrenched off iron gate, and in a couple of minutes had discovered a couple of shaggy, long-tailed horses and also a camel tied to the trees, and all three carrying across their shoulders large sacks that were already two-thirds full of plunder.

They cut adrift the sacks of spoil, readjusted the stirrup leathers, and mounting, rode out into the open place or square, meeting the rightful owners of the steeds before they had got a hundred yards on their way.

Instead of advancing and laying claim to the animals, however, they threw down such loot as they were carrying and ran away. Captain Donelly's bright scarlet cavalry cloak having, apparently been the cause of their alarm.

Spurring after the base rascals, he grabbed hold of the one he first caught up with and demanded in peremptory tones which way the army had gone.

"Out through the Rosetta gate and on towards Kafr Dowar," was the sullen answer.

"And the general and his staff? His excellency Arabi Pasha, I mean," continued Frank.

"Has followed the artillery train in the same direction," was the response.

Captain Donelly asked no further questions, but let the trembling wretch go, who immediately rushed after his companions, whilst Frank turned towards his faithful follower and observed:

"I have no doubt the fellow spoke the truth, indeed, not knowing who I am, he could have no reason for deceiving me. At any risk I must follow, Pat, for wherever Arabi Pasha is there will my wife be also. Distrusting her parents, as he now evidently does, he will keep her under his own eye, of that be assured."

"Well, yer honer, he'll be a rogue if he does, and he'll be a fool if he don't. So, as sure as yer honor follows yer wife last as surely I'll follow yer honor."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Wive's Nerves.

There is not a wife living who would not resent being told that her womanly nature, her true self, was being destroyed, undermined by a too intense and absorbed devotion on the part of her husband; that she was daily losing womanly strength and force, and rapidly becoming a clog and impediment to her husband's progress, because of his indulgence. We hear a great deal said about the selfishness of men, but unbiassed observers will have to admit that a great proportion of the selfishness that escaped from Pandora's box found refuge in the hearts of women.

Look about the world and see if you do not find as many husbands victims of a wife's nerves, headache, or backache, as you find wives sacrificed to a husband's sins or weaknesses. Men's acts of selfishness are more apparent, as a usual thing; they are more flagrant. Woman's selfishness is more insidious.

A husband's comfort is wholly dependent on a wife. If she chooses to revenge herself for any inattention or deprivation, there are thousands of petty ways open to her that a man would scorn to use. The writer calls to mind a pretty, girlish wife, who was excessively extravagant, and who had a most devoted husband. Sitting with a party of ladies one day when the subject of managing husbands was under discussion, she shook a pretty golden head, and with a merry laugh said, "I manage better than any of you; when Sammy don't do just as I wan't him to, I go to bed and stay there till he gives in." There was a burst of protests, but the young woman went on with perfect calmness. "You know, last week, you all thought I was ill. I wasn't. I wanted a hundred dollars for my spring dress and bonnet; Sammy would only give me fifty; but I tell you he was glad to give me the other fifty to get me up. I'd have stayed there until now, if he had not." And she looked around with an air of triumphant pride. There are few women who resort to such methods—none worthy of an honest love; but are there not women who assume a cold, reserved, constrained manner if they are deprived of an indulgence or liberty, women who resent, perhaps unconsciously, any control over actions or expenditures?

Few wives or children stop to think how little, comparatively, of a husband's or father's income is expended on himself alone. The major part is devoted to home and its inmates. This financial abnegation is accepted as a matter of course by those at home and abroad, and the world makes a butt of the man who does otherwise; but surely the deepest devotion should be given in return from those who are benefited by it.

Formal Opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The formal opening of the Canadian Pacific railway early the coming spring for through business to the Pacific will be a most interesting event and will mark an important epoch in the history of the great Northwest. There has been nothing stingy about the policy of the Canadian Government in its relations to this great enterprise, and that its liberality will be thoroughly appreciated and approved by the Canadian public so long as the road exists we cannot for a moment doubt. The building of the road has not only opened up an important through line between the ocean but has rendered it possible to settle and profitably occupy vast areas of country which would otherwise always have remained unoccupied except by wild Indian Tribes. Far beyond Winnipeg are many millions of acres, the possibilities of which for the prodution of small grains are almost unlimited. Already prosperous towns and communities are springing up all along the line as if by magic, and as was the case with the Northern Pacific, regions are proving themselves to be exceedingly fertile which had been supposed to be almost sterile.—Railway Age.

A SHOT FROM THE SADDLE.

An Adventure with Apaches.

I never hear the Apaches mentioned without shuddering. It was in the summer of 1878; the Apaches were then peaceful, but an outbreak was expected at any moment. One day, while travelling by rail in New Mexico, and while engaged in conversation with an old settler about the probabilities of an outbreak, the old gentleman suddenly called my attention to which he discerned in the distance. Pointing his long, bony finger to a range of mountains, he said: "Young man, your eyes are better than mine; see if you can make it out." The clearness of the atmosphere rendered objects many miles away perfectly discernible. On the top of the Florita mountains, and on either side of a pass which cuts the range in twaine, I could easily see two bands of Indians. From the midst of those on the south side of the pass there arose a perfectly the signal of the Apaches. That signal was answered by the waving and turning of a blanket fastened to poles, by Indians on the opposite side of the pass. The latter were renegade Navajoes. The old settler said the signs were unmistakable, the Apaches were about to go on another raid, but in his opinion they were going south and wanted the Navajoes to go with them. When the train arrived at Deming the facts known were reported to the troops stationed there. While staying in the town I learned that a party of miners had struck it rich in the Florita mountains, at a point about fourteen miles from there, and I resolved to visit the camp. I bought a beautiful blooded horse, fully sixteen hands high, very powerful, and which seemed possessed with the intelligence of a human being, and rode away. I found the camp without any trouble and learned that the stories of the miner's great find had been greatly exaggerated. In fact, they were pulling up stakes preparatory to leaving that day for a camp some miles distant. They begged me to accompany them, giving as a reason that the

A SERIES OF PECULIAR SIGNS

ROUND BALL OF SMOKE,

INDIANS WERE AROUND THEIR CAMP

the night before and it was unsafe for me to return. As I had an engagement in Deming that night I refused their offer and started on the return trip. The men accompanied me to the trail, where we parted. The trail at the foot of the mountain was abrupt, and ran through a small canon. Just as I emerged from the gorge I saw a sight that fairly chilled me to my marrow. About a quarter of a mile to the right of the trail were seven of the most hideous-looking scoundrels I ever looked upon. They were a portion of Jaronimo's savages seated on ponies, and a glance showed me they were heavily armed with Winchesters. Besides having their war-paint each wore a sort of skull cap, on the sides of which were fastened the horns of a deer. The moment I came out they set up a shout that MADE MY BLOOD RUN COLD.

I couldn't go back to the miners with any certainty of finding them, for we had been separated an hour. To go ahead would probably result in a horrible death. To retreat and hide in some canon was impossible, for the devils would find me; to fight them in their own style would be madness, for they would starve me out. My only recourse was to make a race for my life. I knew I could depend upon my horse unless he should meet with some mishap, and my mind was quickly made up. I urged the splendid animal forward. He, too, seemed to appreciate the situation, for he leaped down the steep incline without a misstep, and

THE RACE FOR LIFE BEGAN.

The red devils, too, were urging their ponies to the utmost, and it looked as though they would head me off. At the touch of the spurs my horse fairly flew over the ground, and as the distance to the objective point grew less the excitement increased. I thought of her to whom I was to be joined the following month. It was my last trip, and should I be killed who would know it? Would the red devils leave enough of me by which I could be recognized, should they catch me? All these thoughts ran through my mind like lightning. I had reached a point where it was impossible for them to head me off, and I knew that unless my horse stepped in a hole I would win the race. I had still about four miles to trave when

MY HORSE STUMBLED.

Fortunately, however, I caught the horn o the saddle and saved myself from being thrown over the horse's head. He raised himself and was away like the winds, while the Indians, with a yell, began firing. Here was another trouble I had not anticipated. I did not fear being hit myself, but what i my horse should be disabled? The house and spires of the churches could easily be seen, and if I could only attract the attention of the people by firing I would receive their aid. I turned in my saddle while the and taking a hasty aim fired at the neares Apache. Whether I hit him or his horse know not, but horse and rider rolled over and over on the ground. The Indians stopped, and, with demoniacal yells, clustered around the fallen brave, while I, having no time to investigate, rode into town a very thankful man.

BULLETS WERE WHIZZING ABOUT ME

One of our brother journalists went into a barber shop the other day to have his hair cut and fell asleep during the operation. The barber, who awoke him when he had finished, said to him: "You are tired, I understand it. It's the same way with me when evening comes. Ah, this head work is something terrible."

"You went to Mentone for your health?" "No, for my wife's; and I am pleased to state my trip was entirely successful." "Ah, then she recovered?" "No, sir, she died. I said it was successful."

A Jewess, engaged to marry a young man of her race at an early date, astounded the relatives by eloping with a Portuguese aeronaut. She wanted a husband accustomed to moving in the highest circles.

Imperial Unity With Legislative Diversity.

Irishmen to leave Westminster.

IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT RETURNS CONTROL OF CUSTOMS, EXCISE, ARMED FORCES, CONSTABULARY, COINAGE, FOREIGN AND COLONIAL RELATIONS, AND ROYAL PREROGATIVES—ALMOST EVERYTHING ELSE CONCEDED.

LONDON, April 8.—In the House of Commons to-day at five o'clock Mr. Gladstone rose amid enthusiastic cheering and moved for permission to introduce a Bill to amend the previous legislation, and to make provision for the future government of Ireland. On making this motion, Mr. Gladstone said.—"I could wish that it had been possible to expound to the House the whole policy and intentions of the Government with referenee to Ireland. Although the question of reform in the tenure of land the Irish government are so closely and inseparably connected, it is yet impossible to undertake the task of elucidating

BOTH QUESTIONS TOGETHER.

I do not know of any previous task laid upon me involving so diversified an exposition. In contemplating the magnitude of this task, I am filled with painful mistrust, but that mistrust is absorbed in a feeling of the responsibility that will be upon me if I should fail to bring home to the public mind the magnitude and the various aspects of the question. We should or skirmish with this question. (Loud cheers.) We should come to close quarters with it—(cheers)—we should get at the root of it; we should take means not merely intended for the wants of to-day or to-morrow, but should look into the distant future. We have arrived at a stage in our political when the two roads part one from the other, not soon probably to meet again. The time is come when it is incumbent on the duty and the honor of Parliament to come to some decisive resolution on this matter. Our intention is, therefore, to propose to the Commons that which,

NO LONGER FENCE

TRANSACTIONS WITH IRELAND

IF HAPPILY ACCEPTED, will, we think, liberate Parliament from the restraints under which, of late years, it has ineffectually struggled to perform the business of the country, and will restore British legislation to its natural, ancient, unimpeded course, and, above all, establish harmonious relations between Great Britain and Ireland—(hear, hear)—on a footing of

THOSE FREE INSTITUTIONS

to which Englishmen Scotchmen, and Irishmen alike are unalterably attached." (Loud cheers, proclamed by the Home Rule members.) After reviewing the condition and crime existing in Ireland since 1833, Mr. Gladstone describes the coercive legislation enforced during the same period as not exceptional but habitual. He compared Ireland during all this period to a man trying to find sustenance in medicine only meant for cure. Coercion, however, had, he said, proved no cure.

SERIOUS DISSATISFACTION

continued to prevail in Ireland, and if England and Scotland had suffered similar hardships, he believed the people of those countries would resort to means similar to those the Irish had used to ventilate their grievances. (Parnellite cheers.) Coercion was admitted to have for the past 53 years, only two of which had been wholly free from repressive legislation. Coercion, unless steam and unbending, and under an autocratic Government, must always fail. Such coercion England should never resort to until every other means had failed. What was the basis of

BEEN A FAILURE

THE WHOLE MISCHIEF,

was the fact that the law was discredited in Ireland. It came to the Irish people with a foreign aspect, and their alternative to coercion was to strip the law of its foreign character and invest it with a domestic character. (Loud Irish cheers.) Ireland, though represented in Parliament numerically equal with England or Scotland, was really not in the same position politically, England

MADE HER OWN LAWS.

Scotland has been encouraged to make her own laws as effectually as if she had six times her present representation. The consequence was that the mainspring of the law in England and Scotland was felt to be the English or Scotch. The mainspring of the law in Ireland was not felt by the people of Ireland to be Irish; he therefore deemed it little to hold that the state of the law which he had described conduced to the real unity of this great, double, world-wide Empire. "Something must be done," continued Mr. Gladstone, "something is imperatively demanded from us to restore in Ireland the first conditions of civil life; the

LESS THAN MOCKERY

FREE COURSE OF LAW,

the liberty of every individual in the exercise of every legal right, their confidence in the law, and their sympathy with the law, apart from which no country can be called a civilized country." What, then, was the problem before him? It was this:—How to reconcile with diversity of Legislatures. Mr. Grattan held that these parposes were reconcilable—more than that, he demanded a severance of the Parliaments with a view to the continuity and everlasting unity of the Empire. Was that an audacious paradox? Other countries had and under much more difficult circumstances. We ourselves might be said to have solved it with respect to Ireland during the time that Ireland had a separate Parliament. Did it destroy the unity of the British Empire? (Cheers.) Mr. Gladstone then pointed to the case of Norway and Sweden, which countries were, he said, united upon a footing of strict and co-equality. Then there was, he added, the case of Austria and Hungary, and with regard to those countries he asked whether the condition of Austria at the present moment was not more perfectly solid, secure, and harmonious than it was prior to the existing condition between that country and Hungary. It could not be questioned that its condition was one of

IMPERIAL UNITY

SOLVED THE PROBLEM,

LEGISLATIVE INDEPENDENCE

SOLIDITY AND SAFETY,

compared with that of the time when Hungary was making war upon her. The claim of Ireland to make laws for herself was never denied, continued Mr. Gladstone, until the reign of George II. The Parliament of Grattan was as independent in point of authority as it could be They (the Government) were not about to propose the repeal of the Union. It was impossible to propose the repeal of the Union until they had settled what was the essence of the Union. He defined the essence of the Union to be the fact that, whereas there was two seperate and independent Parliaments, after the Union there was but one. To speak of the dismemberment of the Empire, was in this century a misnomer and and an absurdity. The fault of the administerative system of Ireland was that its spring and source of action was unjust. (Cheers.) The Government, therefore, felt that the settlement of the question was to be found by establishing

BEFORE THE UNION,

A PARLIAMENT IN DUBLIN

—(Irish cheers)—for the conduct of business of both a legislative and administrative nature The political economy of the three countries must be reconciled. There should be an equitable distribution of Imperial burdens; next, there must be reasonable safeguards for the minority, and why could not this minority in Ireland take care of itself? He had no doubt about its ability to do that, when we have pressed through the

PRESENT CRITICAL PERIOD,

and been disarmed of the jealousies with which any change was approached. But for the present there were three classes of people whom they were bound to consider:—Firstly, the class connected with the land; secondly, the civil servants and officers of the Government in Ireland; thirdly, the Protestant minority. The speaker could not admit the claim of

THE PROTESTANT MINORITY

in Ulster or elsewhere to rule on questions which were for the whole of Ireland. Several schemes for the seperate government of Ulster had been submitted to him. One was that Ulster Province should be excluded from the operations of the present Bill. Another was that should be provided for Ulster, and a third suggested that certain rights should be reserved and placed under provincial councils. None of these proposals had appeared to the Government to be so completely justified by its merits, or by the weight of public opinion in its favor, as to warrant the Government in including it ig their Bill. However, they deserved fair consideration, and the free discussion that would follow the introduction of the present Bill might

A SEPARATE AUTONOMY

LEAD TO THE DISCOVERY of one plan which had a predominating amount of support, and the Government seemed likely to give genial satisfaction Referring to the great settlement of 1782, Mr. Gladstone said: "It was not a real settlement, and why? Was it Ireland that prevented a real settlement being made? (Irish cheers.) No! it was

A MISTAKEN POLICY

of England, listening to the pernicious voice and claims of ascendancy. (Hear.) The Irish Parliament labored under great disadvantages. Yet it had in it a spark of the spirit of freedom, and it emancipated the Roman Catholics in Ireland when the Roman Catholics in England were still unemancipated. It received Lord Fitzwilliam with open arms, and when after a brief career he was recalled to England the Irish Parliament registered

ITS CONFIDENCE IN HIM

by passing a resolution desiring that he should still administer the Government. Lord Fitzwilliam had promoted the admission of Roman Catholics into the Irish Parliament and there was a spirit in that Parliament which, if it had had free scope, would have done noble work, and probably would have solved all the Irish problems and have saved this Government infinite trouble." He would now pass to the plan

HOW TO GIVE IRELAND

a Legislature to deal with Irish as distinguished from Imperial affairs. (Hear.) He was confronted at the outset with what he felt to be a formidable dilemma. Ireland was to have a domestic Legislature for Irish affairs. That was his postulate from which he set out. Were the Irish members and the Irish representative peers in either House to continue to form part of the representative assemblies? The speaker thought it would be perfectly clear that if Ireland was to have a domestic Legislature the Irish peers and the Irish representatives could not come to Parliament to control England's and Scotland's affairs. (Cheers.) Then with regard to the question should come to the House of Commons for the settlement of Imperial affairs, he thought that could not be done. He had, therefore, arrived at the conclusion that Irish members and Irish peers ought not to sit in the palace of Westminster. (Oh! Oh!! and cheers.) If Irish members were not to sit in the House of Commons, Irish peers ought not to

WHETHER IRISH REPRESENTATIVES

SIT IN THE OTHER

House of Parliament. (Hear, hear, and Oh!) How were the Irish people to be taxed if they had legislators in both countries? He believed that Great Britain would never impose upon Ireland taxation without representation, and added, 'If we were to have taxation without representation, then there would come another question which would raise a practical difficulty, and that is, are we to give up of the Empire?" He did not think that by giving up the fiscal unity of the Empire they were giving up the unity of the Empire. He, however, stood upon the substantial ground that to give up the fiscal unity of the Empire would be a public inconvenience and misfortune. It would be a great

THE FISCAL UNITY

MISFORTUNE FOR GREAT BRITAIN

and a greater misfortune for Ireland. He conceived that one escape from that dilemma would be such an arrangement as would give the Imperial Government authority to levy Customs duties and such Excise duties as were immediately connected with the Customs. The conditions of such an arrangement were: firstly, that the general power of taxation over and above these particular duties should pass unequivocally into the hands of a domestic Legislature in Ireland; secondly, that the proceeds of the

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

should be held for the benefit of Ireland and for the discharge of the obligations of Ireland, and the payment of the balance after these obligations were discharged should be entered into the Irish Exchequer and before the free disposal of the Irish legislative body. The Government Bill provided for this, and the Bill then provided that the representatives of Ireland should no longer sit in the House of Commons or the Irish peers in the House of Lords, but at the same time they would have the right of addressing the Crown, and so possess all they had now. (Oh! and cheers.) It would therefore relieve Irish members from attendance at Westminster. Mr. Gladstone said he had several reasons why this should be the case, even if it was possible for them to attend, as they had a Parliament of their own, and it would be very difficult to have two classes of members in the British House—one class who could connected with the business of the country, and another which could only vote on special and particular questions which were brought before Parliament. Again, it would be very difficult for gentlemen in Ireland to decide who should go to Westminster or who should remain in Ireland, and at the same time to maintain the fiscal unity of the nation. There is another point with regard to the POWERS OF THE LEGISLATURE.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

VOTE ON ALL QUESTIONS

Two courses might have been taken—one was to endow this legislative body with particular legislative powers; the other was to except from the sphere of its action those subjects which the Government thought ought to be excepted, and to leave to it every other power. The latter plan had been adopted. The administrative power would pass with the legislative power. The duration of the proposed legislative body should

NOT EXCEED FIVE YEARS.

The functions which it was proposed to withdraw from the cognizance of the legislative body were three grand and principal functions, viz., everything which related to the Crown; all that which belonged to the defence—the army, the navy, the entire organization of the armed forces, and our foreign and Colonial relations. It would

NOT BE COMPETENT

to pass laws for the establishment or endowment of any particular religion. (Cheers.) As to trade and navigation, it would be a misfortune to Ireland to be separated from England; the Irish Parliament would have nothing to do with coinage, or the creation of legal tender. The subject of the postoffice would be left to the judgment of Parliament, though the Government inclined to the view that it would be more convenient to leave postoffice matters in the hands of

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Quarantine and one or two other subjects were left in the same category. The next subject he had to approach was that of the composition of the proposed legislative body. The Bill proposed to introduce two orders who would sit and deliberate together, with the right of voting separately on any occasion and on the demand of either body, which could be able to interpose a veto upon any measure for a limited time, either until the dissolution or

FOR THREE YEARS.

The orders would be constituted as follows:—First, there were the 28 representative speers who could not continue to sit in the House of Lords after the representatives of the Irish people left the House of Commons. The would have the option of sitting, as a portion of the first order in the Irish Parliament with the power of sitting for life. Some people thought that the option was not likely to be largely used, but the speaker was not of that number, (Hear, hear.) He proposed that with 28

PEERS NOW IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS, there should sit 75 representatives elected by the Irish people. With regard to the powers of election, the constituency would be composed of occupiers of the value of £25 and upwards, and they would be elected for ten years. The property qualification of these representatives would be $200 annual value, or a capital value of £4,000. Mr. Gladstone then said he proposed that the 101 Irish members in the House of Commons should be members of the Irish Parliament, and whilst the first order of the legislative body would consist of one hundred and three members, the second order would consist of two hundred and six. It was proposed to but he would not be the representative of a party or quit office with the outgoing Government.

RETAIN THE VICEROY,

W. J. McFARLAND, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—I have just finished making about 50 pounds of the best Maple Syrup you ever set eyes on; and I have heard so much about Markdale that I just make up my mind that I would see that village and trade off my Syrup for Store Goods. So says I to my old man, I am going down to Markdale; and says he, you aint going to take any Syrup, as us and the children can eat Syrup just as well as those stuck up villagers; but you'd better take some money so that if you see some cheap goods down there you can buy them. Well, Sir, I went down, and there was Markdale as large as life. The first nice building I saw was one of the allfredest nicest houses I ever saw, and I stopped and asked who owned it, and was told Dr. Sproule. Well, it beats all what the N. P. will do for some people. I strolled round town, visited several stores and finally got into your store. I saw Mr. Bowes, Andy Mc., Charley Lawrence and Bert Casson. I heard that they were not too accommodating and were slow; but, to my surprise, they were active and busy, and no sooner had I stepped in the door than one of them began to show me the New Goods which had just arrived from England. As soon as he told me the prices I began to think of the money the old man gave me. The first I priced was Dress Goods, and when he showed me your All Wool Dress Goods for 25 cents per yard, I smiled, then he smiled, then we both smiled; I couldn't stand it longer, so I took 20 yards; then I bought a pair of Lace Curtains, tony, only $1.00, which beats everything I ever saw; then he showed me some Cheap Boots & Shoes, I bought a pair of all leather water tight for the sugar bush for $1.35; then I took a look at your Hand Sewed Boots for men, the best I ever saw, price $3.50. My Jack was with me, says he, mother, I must have a pair of these here Boots. Just when he was trying them on (a pair of 10's) up you stipped and said to me, your boy is built both for strength and activity, legs like a deer and feet like a bear. Jack didn't like it much, but the Boots were so cheap that he took a pair. We then went over to the Grocery counter and sampled your Tea. Now, if there is anything in this world I know when I see, it is good Tea, and I was so pleased with your thirty (30) cent Japan Tea that I took the largest box I could get (67 lbs). We then went up stairs and took a look through your Clothing, and it was so good and cheap and fitted so well that Jack was bound to have a suit: I just had $4.00 left, so Jack went down into his breeches pocket with his left hand and brought out a handful of tobacco and silver and picked out $3.50, so we put it together and bought him the suit. As soon as I go home and get some more money I am coming back to get the old man one of your cheap suits. I priced nearly all the different kinds of goods you had, and no mistake they are the cheapest and best I have seen for years, and I will not hesitate to tell my neighbors. Your Millinery Goods are just the loveliest I ever clapped eyes on, and Mary Jane, she teaches school up on the 7th, will come in and get a Hat, Parisol, and other fixins. She and Joe is going to get spliced this Fall and will want a lot of stuff. Take it all in, you beat the hull country, and I am not giving you any taffy either. I will be down again soon. Wishing you continued prosperity and good health,

Yours faithfully,
MRS. MARY JANE PEPPER.

P. S.—Come up and bring the misses and have a Taffy Pull.

HEALTH.

Recreation.

Recreation is an act by which a person exhausted by physical or mental work is re-created, made over "good as new." The ancients invented the word, and seem to have had a penetration that was in advance of the physiological knowledge of their day.

But recreation, in popular usage, has dropped down from re-creation, almost as far as "holiday" has dropped down from "holy day." All sorts of sports and pleasure seeking are jumbled together, and called recreations. That, however, alone is a recreation which, interchanging with customary labor, aids in keeping the system in a state of high health, or helps to restore it after undue exhaustion.

What may be recreation to one man may not be recreation to his neighbor. A dance may thoroughly recreate some parties, but it is seldom a benefit to the class addicted to it, and never as generally indulged in through the midnight hours, and in vitiated air. The various employments of life generally use men and women up faster at some one point than at others. This is apt to establish a weak point at which they sooner or later break down. What is needed is that the overworked part be allowed to rest, by calling some other part into action.

The overwerked brain should have its energy diverted to underworked muscles. Exhausted muscles are equally recreated by interchange with interesting brain-work.

The overtaxed housewife and mother is best renovated by a pleasant ride, by a congenial visit to pleasing scenes, and by really diverting amusements. Often an hour or two a day with some instructive or entertaining book may actually keep her from becoming unduly strained by her cares and work.

Brain-workers may find recreation even in varying their mental employments. Gladstone diverted himself with translating Homer, and ex-Gov. Long with translating Virgil. Rufus Choate, whose excitements were mainly in the court-room and in Congress, said that, were it not for books, his brain would craze.

He whose mind tends too strongly to any one mood needs to arouse an opposite mental stimulus. Poor Cowper wrote his John Gilpin as a help against gloom. The sick need to be diverted from their ills by whatever is soothing or hopeful or cheering. To do it effectually often requires as much tact as tenderness on the part of friends.

Fresh Air and Ventilation.

The question naturally occurs, What rule can we have so as to know that we get enough fresh air and not too much? The general principle is simpler than its application. It is this:

The average amount of air breathed by every person is about 24 cubic inches at each breath, with about 20 respirations a minute. This would be a cubic foot in three and a half minutes, or 400 cubic feet in 24 hours, or the contents of a room seven feet square and eight feet high. But this is only a fiftieth part of what every healthy person needs, for breathing vitiates the air rapidly, because the air exhaled has 100 times as much carbonic acid gas as the atmosphere, while twice the amount contained in the atmosphere, or eight parts in 10,000, is as large a proportion as can be breathed without injury to the health. Crowded rooms in winter, schools, etc., are sometimes found to contain three or four times as much, and headaches and other ailments are the consequences of breathing the same air over and over again.

There should, therefore, be enough fresh air for every person daily to amount to 20,000 cubic feet, or enough to fill 18 rooms 10 feet square and 10 feet high. This would be amply supplied by an opening, tube, or orifice three inches square, with a moderate current. In the daytime there is usually enough air introduced into rooms through opening doors, cracks in window casings and in other ways. The chief danger is in sleeping-rooms, where pains should be taken to have a circulation. When the room is warm, the air outdoors is quite cold, constant, and often sufficient currents are caused. A hundred persons should have a ventilating orifice equal to two and a half feet square.

Contagion in Scarlet Fever.

Scarlet fever can be communicated by infected milk, and, as far as we know, the milk has only to stand in the room where the disease exists or has existed to absorb the germs, which are so subtle, so light and yet so tenacious as to float in the air and adhere to particles of dust.

We all know how much dust is constantly floating in the air. Let a beam of sunlight pass through an opening in the shutter, and we can readily see how the scales of skin from the body, pieces of lint, etc., can carry these microbes, which may be thrown off in the mucus from the nostrils and mouth or in the perspiration, and even in the urine.

Not only are these secretions germ carriers—that is, contagious—and they have all been proved so by direct inoculation, but the passages from the bowels, as well as the urine, are so—in that way sewer-air may be a means of their conveyance; drinking-water also, as well as the vapor from soil on which these matters have been thrown. Bear in mind, then, that the scarlatina poison can be carried in this way hundreds of miles; that it does not need the personal contact of individuals; that it retains its vitality for months, and even years, unless it be subjected to certain influences that either entirely destroy it or deprive it of its malignancy. These are intense heat, especially boiling or steam, plenty of fresh air and certain chemical substances, as chlorine, sulphurous acid, and others. There is one other point which is important. It is now known that animals, such as horses and dogs, have a disease which is evidently scarlatina; they can be infected by the scarlatina of man, and probably their disease can be communicated to man.

The poison of scarlatina is, then, either inhaled by the individual or is swallowed. It is then taken up by the circulation, and, finding itself surrounded by material which develops it, vivifies it, becomes rapidly reproduced, and the symptoms of the disease show themselves. This period between the reception of the poison and the appearance of the symptoms is called the period of incubation: this is known to be either from one to six days, in some cases longer.

THE CHINOOK DANCE.

Yakima Indians Supplicate the Good Spirit With Weird Incantations.

The Indians are by nature superstitious, but the aggressions of civilization in some quarters have killed many of the old beliefs of the Yakima tribes in signs, "hoodoos" and the efficacy of pum-pum and Tumanimus dances, and the incantations of medicine men in driving away the evil spirit. There are some, however, who refuse to conform to the new customs and revel in superstitions handed down by their untutored progenitors. This faction recently held their annual Tum-animus dance and feast on the reservation just below Union Gap. A reporter was on hand with the expectation of capturing an interesting item, but the mummeries which were wierd and fascinating were at the same time entirely unintelligible. At the head of the Gap on a promontory a large white flag floated from a pole, and two miles further on blue, white and orange flags marked the long, low building or shack where the exercises were being conducted. The medicine house, for so it proved to be, was almost seventy feet in length and completely covered with the matting. From the inside come the monotonous chant of many voices and the steady beating of Indian drums, but although the Signal representative and a young lady who accompanied him walked completely around the structure, they could find no entrance, and were debating a plan of action when a fly of the matting suddenly flew up immediately in front of them, and the hideous painted face of a fantastically clad siwash presented itself to view and nearly scared the young lady into convulsions. A friendly wave of the hand, however, disarmed fear and ushered the pilgrims before a scene of barbaric splendor and grotesqueness which would tax the pen of a Dumas to describe.

On a platform covered with skins, at one end of the lodge, Indian children were crowded, and in front of the little ones was the orchestra of six huge bucks with instruments which appeared to be made of sheepskin stretched over empty cheese boxes. Along the length of the temple or lodge were ranged the bucks on one side and the klootchmen on the other. They were all clad in gorgeous costumes and the many colored blankets and prints gave a rainbow appearance to the worshippers. Their faces were painted with orange, blue, red and white paints, and when there was any considerable space of solid color there would appear fairly well executed figures of moons stars, birds and beasts, in contrasting tints. All had fans of feathers and many wore head-dresses of fine furs, feathers, and even the horns of animals.

There are various pum-pums during the year for divers objects, the one just celebrated being the Tum-animus, or Chinook dance, held for the purpose of propitiating the Deity and bringing in the warm winds from the Orient to carry off the snows. When the winters are unusually hard the Indians do severe penance, and three years ago, when the cattle and cayuses were dying by the hundreds, and the Tum-animus lasted for ten days and the self-inflicted punishments were of a rigid nature. Sa-luskin, one of the head Indians, took a dull knife and hewed out great blocks of flesh from his arms, singing and dancing all of the time in religious frenzy. The next observance is the festival of the "re-burial of the dead," when the bones of Indians who have died or been killed will be exhumed, covered with new blankets and exposed to the view of relations. Then comes the salmon dance, at which the Great Spirit is entreated to send a free run of this succulent fish which form so prominent a factor in the Indian food supply.

The recent Tum-animus was under the direction of Ca-ti-ah-kin, the head medicine man, who directed the observances by means of a bell. For hours and hours the Indians would dance and chant their songs, which are not devoid of harmony, until tired nature could bear no longer, and then they would fall on their knees and offer up their "amens" to the exhortations of the medicine man. The singing and prayers were all in the native language, and even the lookers-on who were familiar with the jargon were unable to catch the drift of the importunings. The close room contributed much to increase the superstitious feeling, and the weird scene was one not soon to be forgotten by those who were present.

VERY SAD.

A Tragedy in Real Life Stranger than Fiction.

A romantic though melancholy history is that of Miss Frances Hranueli, of San Francisco. In 1879 she met, loved, and was loved by a dashing young seaman named Herman Schady, who sailed away soon after their troth was plighted, promising that when the voyage was ended he would return and claim her for his bride. Miss Hraneull's ralatives opposed the match, and she being convinced that they were trying by treachery to keep her from her sailor lad. When she was informed some months later that her lover's vessel had gone down at sea, and that he was drowned, she refused to believe it, insisted that his letters to her were intercepted, and, in a violent paroxysm of rage, vowed that she would never again open her lips in speech. Since that time for seven long years, she has kept her vow, and all the efforts of her friends to induce her to break her voluntary silence have failed. The publication of this story a few days ago in a San Francisco paper attracted the attention of a guest at the Grand Hotel in that city, who called at once at the young lady's residence, and told her that he had shipwrecked in 1869, off Gibraltar, in company with a young man named Schady, who informed him subsequently that he was engaged to be married to Miss Hranueli, who lived in San Francisco, and that he had been separated from her through treachery. The stranger added that he had seen Mr. Schady a short time since in St. Petersburg, and had been requested by him to try and find his sweetheart, in order to tell her that he still loved her and was waiting for her. During the recital the stranger's story Miss Hranueli sat apparently listening, but what he said seemed to make no impression upon her. Her mind was evidently a blank, and if her sailor lover comes back to claim his bride, he will find, instead of the sprightly and beautiful young girl he left behind him seven years ago, a hopeless imbecile.

Cruelty to Brazilian Slaves.

The poor slave girl, Joanna, who had been so cruelly beaten by her mistress, D. Francisca da Silva Castro, a resident of the aristocratic suburb of Botafogo, was mercifully relieved from her sufferings by death on the 14th inst., (February.) That was a generous action of the editor of the Gazeta da Tarde and the Confederacao Abolicionista in caring for her and another unfortunate slave girl, Eduarda, who was discovered in the same house. Both of these girls, one 17 and the other 15 years of age, presented a horrible appearance—their bodies covered with old and fresh scars, bruises and sores, their wrists cut and swollen from cords, and their heads and faces bruised and swollen from the blows received. Fortunately, both of them were immediately photographed, so that there can be no question hereafter of exaggeration. The elder girl, Joanna, was so seriously injured that she died on the 14th, and the death scene was one that will never be forgotten by those who witnessed it. In her delirium she called on her companion, "Eduardo! take off the cords, so I can rest better!" And in a brief time merciful death released both body and soul forever from the bonds of an inhuman institution which must answer hereafter for crimes like this. The mistress has been called upon to answer for the cruelties inflicted upon these two slave girls, but as in all the cases heretofore recorded nothing will be done. Brazilian justice has no punishment for the crimes and cruelties of the slaveholder, nor has it even sympathy for the sufferings of such helpless, downtrodden creatures as these two poor slave girls.

Whiskey or Whiskey.

I am inclined to think that the trade spelling of this word varies somewhat with the nationality of the particular member. I have observed that the Scotch firms seem to adopt the form whisky, Irish firms the form whiskey. In a London periodical devoted to subjects connected with the liquor trade generally, entitled Drinks, of which the February number is now before me, I find the spelling whisky used, moreover, quite incidentally throughout a short article in such a way as to indicate that it is the ordinary orthography of that journal. On the whole, therefore, I think that the evidence points to whisky as being both the modern Scottish orthography and that generally in use except in Ireland.

DEATH DEALING ARTILLERY.

A Sketch of the Royal Gun Factories at Woolwich.

The operations at historic Woolwich in connection with the manufacture of British ordnance are Titanic in their proportions. In what is called the East Forge were cast the monster guns to which have been given the name of "Woolwich Infants." Down the length of this forge are furnaces in which are heated almost to a white heat the bars of the coils from which these guns are built up. At the mouth of the furnace is a machine which, when the bar is of the proper temperature, seizes it and winds it round and round in a glowing spiral. There are several steam-hammers at work in this forge, varying from 3,000 to 6,000 pounds in weight, used for welding together short bars of iron to form one long bar for coiling. In the West Forge are two steam-hammers of immense power. The largest, a twelve-ton hammer, is used for producing the large forgings for the trunnion hoops. The force of its heaviest blows is computed at 400 tons, while it is under such perfect control that a blow can be struck by it which will crack a nut without wounding the kernel.

THE FORTY-TON HAMMER

Is in a shed close by and was first used in May, 1874, on the occasion of the visit of the Czar of Russia. Its falling portion, or "hammer-head," weighs exactly forty tons, and the "striking fall" is fifteen feet, but by the injection of steam into the cylinder above, it is driven down with such immensely increased force, that the blow is equal to what it would be if the hammer fell of itself from a height of eighty feet. The framework required to sustain aloft this weight is formed of two immense iron piers, which at about ten feet from the ground bend over so as to form an imperfect arch, open in the center for the rise and fall of the hammer, and bearing the upper portion of the apparatus. The entire height is forty-five feet; the base covers an area of 120 feet square, and the entire structure weighs 550 tons. It rests upon a foundation of blocks of iron weighing 650 tons, under which to a depth of thirty feet is concrete and timber. As nearly as percussion can be represented by weight a blow from this hammer counts for 1,000 tons.

THE MUSEUM OF THE ROYAL ARTILLERY

Is at the east end of the long front of the arsenal; is supported by the subscriptions of the officers and, though occasionally assisted by the government, is a private institution. It includes a large collection of guns and arms of all sizes, dates and countries. There is also a most extensive and varied collection of stuffed birds and beasts, sent home by officers from abroad, brought down by their guns in several parts of the world, and sent home to be kept at their former quarters. There are skulls of the elephant, walrus and mammoth, mummies, heathen gods, groupes of geological specimens, models of saddles, etc.; in fact, objects of all kinds which are likely to instruct or interest those for whose benefit the museum was instituted.

THE EAST LABORATORY

Is isolated from the rest of the arsenal and is closed to visitors unless by special authority. Here the small arm cartridges are made; as are the rockets, cannon cartridges and other articles, the manufacture of which are dangerous. In these portions of the arsenal a few men and hundreds of boys are employed, and so perfect is the system upon which the work is conducted that accidents are of very rare occurrence. Machinery has been devised by which risky operations are performed in a tube, through which the force of an accidental explosion is carried away, and other precautions are taken by which the chances of the loss of life through accident are reduced to the norrowest limits. Everybody employed in these works changes his clothes on entering so as to avoid the possibility of taking in any dangerous article, and they all put on boots in which there are no nails but copper ones. Large slippers in which persons entering the inclosure on business encase their feet are also provided. Within the limits of the arsenal is a 500 yard range for testing small arms and ammunition, and outside is a longer range for testing larger guns. The very large guns, however, are taken to Shoeburyness, off the Nore, for testing.

OTHER PLACES OF INTEREST

Are either directly or indirectly connected with the arsenal, but the limits of this article will permit only a passing reference to two of them.

The Barracks for the Royal Horse and Foot Artillery are the best in the Kingdom and the principal front is one of the finest buildings of the kind in England. In connection with the barracks is a theatre and a handsome church, while everything possible to devise for the comfort and pleasure of both officers and men is provided.

The Royal Military Academy was originally established in 1719, but was not fully organized until 1741, when George II., by royal warrants directed the founding of an academy "for instructing persons belonging to the military part of the ordnance in the several branches of mathematics, fortifications, etc., proper to qualify them for the service of artillery and the office of engineers. Prince Arthur and the Prince Imperial of France were educated here.

An Incident.

BY CHARLES K. BOLTON.

I.

Three men talked gayly on a west-bound train,
And laughing, now and then became profane.

II.

A little girl near by could hear them swear,
And blushed until her face was doubly fair.

III.

Then, rising from her seat, she softly went
To him who seemed the most irreverent,

IV.

And placed her pocket Bible in his hand;
The strong man colored at her reprimand.

V.

He ceased to talk, and scanned each field and scar,
Until they halted, when he left the car.

VI.

But soon he came with roses white and red,
And giving, kissed her, as he bowed and said

VII.

"Good-bye, my child; I'll keep the book you give,
And read its pages long as I may live."

Corporal Williams and several others of "B" battery, after returning from the end of the troubles, went to England, where they now are.

Gunner Pierre Langlois, of Grosse Isle, P. Q, served five years in "B" battery, and six in "A," and is still a member of the latter corps. Gunner J. Stout, of "A" battery, is another man yet on the sick list. He was run over by a gun carriage at Batoche. His spine was injured, and three ribs were broken. For seventeen weeks he lay between life and death, but is now recovering. His pension will be 60c. per diem.

Staff-sergeant Mawhinney, who was sergeant major of "A" battery in the Northwest, will receive 90 cents per diem pension. His experience is a very unenviable one. In the engagement at Fish Creek he was shot three times within a period of five minutes—the first bullet went through his right thumb; the second struck his cartridge cap, knocking it and the fingers off, the third bullet, when he had his rifle in position for a shot, penetrated the arm at his right arm.

Staff sergeant Walling of "A" battery will receive a pension of 90 cents per diem. He is suffering from eczema and varicose veins, brought on by excessive marching in the Northwest.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

The Mother's Work.

The fact that it is no trifling affair to manage a house is never more fully realized by the feminine head of the establishment than when she is unable from illness to follow the beaten path. The rest of the family also suddenly realize that she is the main spoke in the wheel. He has to hunt up his gloves and newspaper himself, and if misfortune appears in the shape of a lost button he becomes truly wretched. It is strange how entirely helpless the married man in general is, when he has no one to look after him. Individually and collectively he has a great love for being waited upon, all the way from having his boots blacked to being read or sung to sleep.

A lady said to another one day in a fit of confidence, "Twice a week for twenty years, when he has asked me where he should find his clean shirts, and all this time they have been in the same drawer of the same bureau, and I have to tell him every time," she concluded dolefully.

Her companion burst into a hearty laugh. "Why," said she, "for over thirty years my husband has asked me the self same question and I have always answered calmly, 'left hand side of the drawer next to the top.'" Then each congratulated herself that she was not the only forgetful man in existence to wait upon. It generally seems easier to wait up after and wait upon the members of the family than to insist on their doing for themselves, but with children it is certainly the wiser plan to make them wait on themselves as much as possible. The most essential step is to provide places for things like hooks for clothes, bureaus for undergarments, bags for shoes and stockings, shelves for books and a box for playthings; then you can well insist that things shall be kept in their right places.

If you have boys you may be the means of training up a John who will not have to be told a hundred times a year where his clean linen is, provided he has an orderly mother. There is no danger but what there will be a call for all your strength if you do not keep continually on the jump for the real or imaginary wishes of all the rest of the family. As a rule, with few exceptions, the life of a mother is one continual giving out of mind and strength for others. The care-worn hand of an aged mother is a symbol of self-sacrificing toil.

Everyday Cooking.

BEEF'S HEART.—Make a pint bowl of dressing from bread crumbs, a slice or two of salt pork chopped fine, and an egg, the whole well seasoned with pepper and a pinch of sage. Onion is good to flavor a dressing with, but it is never safe to use onions in cooking, unless you know the peculiarities and the tastes of those who are to partake of them. After thoroughly cooking and cleansing the heart, fill with the dressing, and bind it with a narrow strip of cloth; then [illegible] or until it is tender, [illegible] allow the water to [illegible] frequently. Take up the heart, [illegible] the broth remaining, [illegible] gravy.

[illegible] Pudding.—One cup of butter, [illegible] cupfuls of sugar, one [illegible] cup of cream, one tablespoonful [illegible] soda dissolved in a little hot water, two cupfuls of sour cream, cream-tartar enough to make it rise, and flour enough to make it thoroughly sifted. [illegible] in a steamer an hour. After the pudding has been [illegible] a little. Serve with sauce.

[illegible] SAUCE.—One-half cup of butter, one cupful powdered sugar, the whites of one egg, one half cup of cream, one teaspoonful of lemon or vanilla. Cream the butter, add the sugar, then the whites of the egg, beat well, and last the cream. Place the dish over another of hot water; stir until it is light, but be sure not to cook it until it looks yellow.

[illegible] CUSTARD.—Two tablespoonfuls of corn starch, one quart of milk, two eggs, a little salt, four tablespoonfuls of sugar, and one teaspoonful of flavoring. Boil the milk, then add the corn starch dissolved in a little milk, then add the eggs well beaten with the sugar; let it boil up once, stir it and let it cool. Add the flavoring after it is removed from the fire.

[illegible] CAKES.—Sift one teaspoonful of cream tartar and one-half teaspoonful of soda into one pint of flour, a pinch of salt, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, and two tablespoonfuls of sugar. When ready to fry, mix with new milk rather stiff. Have the fat of lard boiling hot, and drop them in [illegible] balls about as large as half of a hen's egg. They will roll over, and when they are done. Take out with a skimmer and drain in a colander. Serve hot.

[illegible] ROLLS.—Take a pint bowl full of light bread dough; beat a fresh egg and add it; knead it thoroughly—it will take ten minutes. Roll out an inch thick, cut into cakes and lay them upon a tin sheet and raise in a warm place. Bake in a quick oven.

Economy in Love.

Sir Guy—Fred, I saw you at the Academy with a strange girl last night. Who was it?

Fitzmonoby—That was my spring and summer girl. I've shaken my fall and winter love.

Fitzmonoby—Nothing easier to explain. My winter girl likes icecream and hates oysters, and my summer girl despises icecream and adores the bivalves. By this plan I save enough each year to buy my wife shoes in Lunnon.

THE AGONY OF RABIES.

Dreadful Sufferings Ended by a Terrible Death.

George W Neal, the keeper of the Newark dog pound, who was bitten by a Spitz dog, died in great agony the other evening at his home. The physicians declare positively that he was a victim of hydrophobia.

He had passed a restless night, notwithstanding potent narcotics. At four o'clock on the day of his death, while his guardians, Policemen Astley, and Cosgrove, were in another room he leaped from bed delirious and arming himself with a poker, dashed up stairs to the rooms of his father in-law, John P. Moore, uttering wild cries. The officers pursued him,

"Go back! I'll not be taken; go back!" he cried, with the poker raised threateningly. Mr. Moore calmed him. At that moment the opening of a door caused a draught of air to blow on him and he was seized with the same laryngeal convulsions which were produced at the sight of water. He was led to his own room and quieted with an injection of atropia.

THIRST NOT TO BE QUENCHED.

Early in the morning Drs. Bradin and O'Gorman called. As soon as the patient saw them he exclaimed:—

"Don't send me away; please don't."

"Are you thirsty?" asked Dr. O'Gorman.

"Yes, very," was the reply. Dr. O'Gorman cut an apple into very small pieces and fed Neal with it. This was his first nourishment in three days. It was only a little, for convulsions began and atropia was again used. Drs. Bradin tried to moisten the sufferer's lips with the use of a sponge, while Neal's eyes were closed so that he should not see the water. As soon as the sponge touched his lips he cried, "Oh, don't! take it away! I can't stand it." Again the experiment was tried, but with the same result, and all attempts at quenching his thirst were abandoned. At nine o'clock his temperature was 103½ and his pulse 150. He was removed from his bed to a sofa near a front window. Every draught caused convulsions, and every hour the nervous symptoms were aggravated. One of the officers passed in front of the window and his shadow fell upon Neal. With a cry of agony he started from the sofa and put his hands over his eyes.

"Go away, for heaven's sake; go away. You torture me," he cried.

A DEVOTED WIFE.

His wife was constantly by his side. When rational the unfortunate man placed his hands in those of his wife and sat in silence. It was just after a fearful convulsive struggle that he turned to her and said:—"I won't suffer long. It will soon be over."

He saw the tears fill his wife's eyes, and it troubled him. Again becoming delirious, he cried:—"If I go, I want Mary to go with me. I can't be separated from her." Another injection of morphine was made, and he was calm for a few minutes. After a slight tremor had passed over him, he said in a low tone to his wife:—"Mary, I wish you would leave me, when I am about to go into convulsions. I am afraid I will injure you. Do go away."

Mrs. Neal never flinched. Even the policemen and the physicians recoiled from him at moments, shuddering at the thought of coming in contact with the deadly virus which flaked from his lips, while struggling in convulsion, but the brave woman never showed a sign of fear, and her devotion never faltered.

At noon he experienced the most violent convulsion. He suddenly sprang from his bed, and cried:—"There, there! see those dogs! They must be drowned! Say, Sebold, how many more did we get to-day? Look, look, at that big black dog! Don't let him come near me. He's mad, mad, mad!"

Again he sank back exhausted, but all the time muttering about Sebold, his assistant at the dog pound; and the dogs, big, little, black, and mad, seemed to be an ever revolving kaleidoscopic vision. In three days his form had grown attenuated. His face was white as marble and his eyes wild and frightened.

USELESS REMEDIES.

At a quarter to five Dr. Bradin made the first injection of curara. An ordinary needle point syringe was used, and the injection was made in the back of the neck, below the base of the brain. The patient did not seem to be affected by it. A vapor bath was then arranged, Lint was placed in all the window cracks and all air passages closed. A kettle of water was placed upon a hot fire, and the steam which arose soon filled the room. At half-past five the thermometer registered 80 degrees.

The patient rested quietly for over an hour. Then he was seized with a violent convulsion. He clutched the pillow upon which his head rested and uttered the strange, croup like sounds peculiar to the disease. The muscles of his neck became rigid and the flesh became hard. His body twitched convulsively, and before he could be restrained he threw himself upon the floor and drew himself up. Cocaine was injected and he rested easier. It was deemed advisable to let him rest on the floor, and with his head resting on a pillow propped against an overturned chair he lay quiet under the soothing influence of the narcotic.

DYING.

Drs. O'Gorman and Herold called at Neal's house at 6 o'clock. They found him free from spasms, but the nervous twitchings of his limbs continued. Dr. O'Gorman saw that the end was near and that further injections of curara was useless.

"Take me to my bed," gasped the man. The sufferer's face and hands were livid. The two stalwart policemen assisted him to his feet, but he sank again to the floor. The shadow of death was upon him, and all in the room saw it. His wife's aged father and mother stood by her side comforting her. The four men who took care of him seemed appalled at the sight. The dying man's two sons recoiled as if in fear.

"Oh, my——," and Neal clutched at his throat. With a sob his wife sprang to his side, and, pushing aside the officers, supported him in her arms, and half carried, half dragged him to the bed. The men, and brave men, too, involuntarily recoiled.

The sufferer suddenly seemed paralyzed, and sank nerveless in his wife's arms.

"Oh, my God, these dogs! Take them away! Oh, pity me and take them away!" he cried.

Dr. O'Gorman and Mrs. Neal placed him on his bed, where he lay as if in a stupor. His hands were cold and rigid, the bloodshot eyes protruded from their sockets, and his lower limbs were as marble. Another injection of morphia was given, and the sufferer seemed to rest more easy.

THE LAST SCENE.

At twenty minutes of seven Neal raised himself up in bed and cried, "There! there! Do you see that dog?"

The terrible earnestness of the words, the look of terror on the face and the quivering of the pointed hand, sent a shudder through the group around the bed.

"There in that corner," and he pointed into the next room. "I must leave this bed. It will kill me," he exclaimed in his frenzy. His wife caught him in her arms as he was falling over the edge of the bed and bore him into the next room, where he was laid in the same position from which he had struggled shortly before. His wife knelt beside him and looked into his bloodshot eyes.

"I am burning up!" he exclaimed. He gasped for breath. Great beads of perspiration stood on his brow. His feet and hands were cold.

At ten minutes to seven he groaned. A strange gutteral sound came from his throat. His distorted features relaxed. His chest heaved, and with a feeble groan the sufferer sank back into the arms of his father-in-law, dead. His wife, who had borne up bravely through the terrible ordeal, gave way at last. She was led from the room by her mother, and a sheet was thrown over the corpse.

Neal's death occurred just fifty-seven hours after he was seized with the first paroxysm. The time elapsing since the first bite inflicted on Neal is seventy days. He was within the limit of the time allotted for the development of the disease, the time being from eight to ten weeks. The first symptoms were developed in Neal's case in sixty-seven days, although the first intimation was two days earlier. The usual time for the disease to become fatal is from three to six days, and Neal's limit was, from the first intimation, six days, and from the first symptoms, three days.

SLAUGHTER of the INNOCENTS.

THE SPARROWS MUST GO.

By the dissection of many hundred specimens it has been proved that 94 per cent. of the food of the sparrows consists of grain or seeds of some kind, and insect food only about 6 per cent, and that they consume in Great Britain alone four million bushels of grain annually. The Union Ornithologist recommends as follows:—First. "That sheltering or otherwise fostering the sparrow by the public, be discouraged, and that its introduction artificially into new localities, and its sale for such purposes, be forbidden by law." Second, "That all existing laws protecting the sparrow be repealed, and that bounties be offered for its destruction."

Munitions .22 SHOT FOR THE SHOT CARTRIDGE Slaughter.

CONSIST OF A PATENT SHOT CARTRIDGE.

These cartridges are made in the ordinary sizes of Rim and Central Fire for both Pistols and Rifles. The shot is enclosed in a thick paper case, packed closely, and when set in the shell has the appearance of being a bullet. This case is lubricated on the outside. When shot, the paper case is forced through the rifling of the weapon, and thoroughly cleans and oils the barrel, and at the same time acting as a shot concentrator. Upon reaching the muzzle of the rifle or pistol, the case bursts and the shot scatters.

The 22 long, 32 long and 38 long Rim Fire Cartridges are adapted to Revolvers, to Flobert, Remington, Ballard, Stevens, and other Rifles of those calibres. The 22 Cartridges are all made with No. 12 Chilled Shot, while in 32 and 38 the shot is larger, say No 9 shot, and more of it. These sizes are especially adapted for sparrows or other small birds, and especially for quail, partridges, squirrels, and other small game.

From testimonials received, we notice that for cats and cats they have been largely used, especially for cats. A cat, after receiving one dose, (if she does not leave the premises) rarely ever returns, but takes up her abode in some place remote from the man who owns a rifle or pistol and keeps a stock of shot cartridges about his house.

The S. & W. sizes—32 and 38—are used largely by persons who own a better class of revolvers, such as M. H. & Co's Automatic Revolvers, S. & W. Revolvers, and the better grade of Bull Dog Revolvers, such as X L Bull Dog or better class of Am. Bull Dogs, or any other good C. F. Pistol. Persons who are not owners of rifles can take a few hundred of these cartridges with them on their summer vacations and have really as much sport with them by using them in their revolvers, as do those who carry rifles. The 44 Winchester Shot Cartridges (No. 6 and 8 shot) are adapted to the Winchester Magazine Rifle and all Frontier Pistols of same calibre, and are used for shooting prairie chickens on the western prairies.

We cannot point to one instance where it did not. "Where does it have the largest sale?" Right in the City of Hamilton, where it is manufactured, there has been over on thousand dollars' worth sold in the last year retail, and the great majority of the sales are by one recommending it to another. For sale at 50c. and $1.00 per bottle by R. L. Stephen, Druggist. 4

FIRE IN STAYNER.—A serious fire occurred last Friday night in the building owned by J. H. McKeggie and occupied by Lindsay Bros., dry-goods merchants, and the upper storey by Freemasons' Lodge. The fire burned furiously, and, though the steam fire engine promptly got to work and an excellent and continuous supply of water was obtained, the building and contents were totally destroyed. The fire then communicated to Campbell's Agricultural Implement shop, the office of The Stayner Sun, the store of W. G. Begg, and the residence of Charles Wiggins, all of which were totally destroyed.

McGREGOR'S SPEEDY CURE.

When we say McGregor's Speedy Cure is the only perfect cure for Dyspepsia, Liver Complaints, Indigestion and Impure Blood, we are telling plain facts, of which hundreds upon hundreds can testify who have been restored to perfect health by its use. We would therefore advise you strongly if you are a subject of any of the above troubles to give McGregor's Speedy Cure a trial and be convinced. It is sold in 50c. and $1.00 bottles at R. L. Stephen's Drug Store. 2

FIRE BUG.—On Saturday evening last, about 11 o'clock, a fire was discovered in the upper story of Noble's carriage shop, but was speedly subdued with a few pails of water. The origin appears a mistery as no fire had been in that portion of the building that day except perhaps that in a man's pipe, and as to being set on fire, it appears strange that any person would start a fire at that hour of the evening when everyone was about.

IMPORTANT NEWS ITEM.

COOKSTOWN.—Mrs. Campbell had been troubled for a number of years with Indigestion and Constipation, and was induced to try McGregor's Speedy Cure and found it all that was needed, and would recommend its use to any person similarly troubled. This invaluable remedy is sold in every part of Canada at 50c. and $1.00 per bottle. Sold at R. L. Stephen's Drug Store.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.—Owing to an increase in business the Mansion House is undergoing a thorough renovation, as I find that an increase in the trade of this house requires it. As my lease continues for a term of years I find that certain improvements would be advantageous in attending to the comforts of my customers, I have, at considerable expense, made these improvements. To my patrons I would say, that in the future, as heretofore, they will receive the most careful and prompt attention. Yours truly, Jas. Bryan.

BE ON YOUR GUARD.

Don't allow a cold in the head to slowly and surely develop itself into Catarrh when you can be cured for 25 cents. A few application will cure incipient Catarrh. One to two boxes will cure ordinary Catarrh. One to five boxes will cure chronic Catarrh. Dr. Chase's Catarrh cure, Sold by all dealers at 25 cents per box.

Flowers, Beautiful Flowers.

A Few Words on the Potato Rot.

A grave word of caution needs to be spoken on the subject of potato-growing this year. There seems to be no doubt that the disease which attacked the crop last season was the genuine potato rot. We have in a previous number of The Rural fully explained the nature of that disease, and we give some hints on the best means of dealing with it. There is a great danger of it spreading over a wider area of country this year, and of its proving far more destructive than hitherto. But with the exercise and care and judgment on the part of farmers, we think it is possible to stay the disease to some extent—to keep it from running riot over the land. A few facts ought to be well understood and remembered. One is, that the disease is of the zomatic class; by which is meant that it is infectious. It spreads from plant to plant, and from field to field, by minute germs carried by the wind, or it may be in some portion of the plant itself; and these germs falling upon a healthy plant communicate to it the disease. Another is, that those germs may survive the winter in the tops of the potato, as well as in the tuber itself, with unimpaired vitality, and their growth and development will begin just as soon as they are placed in the favourable conditions; in other words, as soon as they come into contact with the potato plant in a moist or growing state. A third is, that an infected seed potato is a centre for a sure spread of the disease—one in a field being sufficient, in the proper state of weather, to spread the infection to the whole field. Now, for a few words of caution. Don't plant a seed potato that is, even in the slightest degree, diseased. Don't plant on the same ground on which last season's crop was grown if there was any appearence of disease in the crop. Don't plant on the windward side of last year's crop, if it was affected—either your own crop or your neighbor's; the wind may carry germs from tops or tubers left on last years' ground. Don't plant in moist or badly drained land; excess of moisture predisposes the plants to an attack of the disease. Plant none but healthy tubers; plant on the leeward side of land planted last year, as far from that as possible; and plant early on well drained and lively soil, so as to ensure an early ripening of the crop.—[Rural Canadian.

YOUNG FOLKS.

AN ADVENTURE IN CENTRAL ASIA.

BY DAVID KER.

There are many deserts in Tartary, but none more grim and dreary than the great waste of "Kara Koum" (Black Sand), which stretches across the whole northwest of Central Asia. Day after day you go wearily on over the endless level, with your head aching and your skin dry and feverish, seeing nothing but the burning sky above and the burning sand below, whose the only thing to show that you have not wandered from the right track is a stray mound of earth here and there, out of which peer the whitened bones of horses and camels, and sometimes even of men, who have died here before you.

But if you do happen to meet a man, you must be on your guard, for in these wild regions the old joke about "catching a Tartar" often comes true in grim earnest. When one of these flat-faced, bullet-headed fellows comes trotting up to you on his wiry little horse, looking cunning at you from under the high cap of black sheep-skin that is slouched over his small, narrow, rat-like eyes, you had better keep your hand on your revolver and your eye upon him until he has answered your challenge of, "Amaun ust?" (is it peace?) with, "Inah' Allah, amaun ust" (please God it is peace).

Why this pleasant place should be called "Black Sand" it is hard to say, for both it and its two great brothers, the "Ak Koum" (White Sand), to the east, and the "Kizil Koum" (Red Sand), to the south, are all of one color, and that color a pale yellow. But it can look "black" enough sometimes in another way, as I knew to my cost. In the driest and loneliest part of it, just as the water is beginning to run low in your skin bag, you come upon a deep, winding furrow in the parched earth, which was a rushing river ages ago, and you think of the cool, clear water that the thirsty sands have drunk up, until you yourself grow thirstier and more dismal than ever.

We were just midway across the desert, and the red sun was sinking over the great waste of lifeless sand, when there suddenly arose between us and it what seemed at first sight like a cloud of withered leaves. But a second glance showed it to be a host of wide-winged living things, moving swift and unswerving, in ranked order, like an army arrayed for battle. But for their amazing numbers one might have taken them for an ordinary flight of grasshoppers; but I had seen such a sight too often not to recognize the destroying march of the locust.

Onward they went to lay waste the rich lands of the south, their vast shadow darkening half the sky, and the whir of their countless wings sounding amid the ghostly silence like the hissing and grinding of some mighty engine. Although thousands passed every moment, it was fully fifteen minutes before the last of the host had gone by.

Then my Tartar servant pointed his brown, bony hand after the shadowy mass, and said, solemnly, "Master we shall have a storm."

"Why do you think so?" asked I, somewhat surprised, for the sky was clear and cloudless as ever,

"The locusts have gone by in their armies, even such as those that the Prophet Moussa Ben Amrahm" (Moses the son of Amram) "brought up against Egypt; and where they come, the blast of the desert is never far behind. Destruction always follows the destroyer."

The terrible emphasis of the man's tone and manner showed that he was thoroughly in earnest; and if he spoke truly, the thought of encountering a desert whirlwind in this perilous spot, where there was enough loose sand to bury a whole army, was anything but pleasant. But what could we do? To go back was as dangerous as to go forward, and to stand still was worse than either; so on we went.

Two hours passed, however, without any sign of danger, and I was just beginning to hope that the Tartar might have been mistaken after all, when the camels, which were harnessed three abreast to my light covered wagon, suddenly stopped short, and began to snuff the air uneasily.

I saw a look of anxiety cloud the Tartar's stern face, instantly reflecting upon that of our Kirghiz driver, whose sharp white teeth, hooked nose, and great black hollow eyes looked quite unearthly in the fitful moonlight.

The camels snuffed again, more quickly and restlessly than before, and then crouched down side by side, with their long necks laid flat on the ground.

"Tebbad!" (sand-storm) shouted the Kirghiz, throwing himself down behind them, and muffling his head in his sheep-skin cloak.

The words were hardly spoken, when a gray dimness rushed down suddenly over the whole sky, and my Tartar and I had barely time to fling ourselves down into bottom of the wagon, when there came a rush and a roar, and all around was one whirl of flying sand and charging storm, which, closely as our shawls were pulled over our faces, seemed to deafen, blind, and strangle us all in one moment.

It seemed many hours to us (though in reality it was less than one) while we lay there, half stifled, but not daring to put forth our heads, listening to the howl of the storm and the sharp "pirr, pirr" of the whirling sand against the sides of our rocking wagon. But at last the hideous uproar died away, and we ventured to peep forth.

A strange sight awaited us. Far as the eye could reach, the smooth sand was billowed like the waves of a stormy sea. Our wagon looked as if steeped in lime, and the lower half of it was hidden altogether. Of the camels nothing could be seen but their humps; and as the Kirghiz started up, throwing off a whirlwind of dust on every side, he seemed to have risen bodily through the earth.

We ourselves had fared little better. In spite of all my wrappings, my skin was as gritty as a match-box from head to foot, and the Tartar's sallow visage looked like a half-washed potato. The warm genial air had suddenly become chilly as a grave, for the Siberian hurricane had brought with it cold memories of frozen seas, and leagues of snowy moorland, and half-seen icebergs drifting wearily through the polar night; and the pale grayish-yellow sand of the Kara Koum, which by its very nature cannot absorb heat, is one of the coldest surfaces in the world.

How we escaped being buried alive outright I was at first quite at a loss to imagine, but the explanation was simple enough. Most fortunately for ourselves, we had halted on the brow of a ridge where the sand lay thin and light, and where the sweep of the wind was too furious to let the drifts gather thickly round us. Had we met the storm in the hollows below, we should all have been dead men, and I still count that night's work one of the narrowest of my many escapes from death."

THE REMNANT OF A ONCE POWERFUL NATION.

BY ANNIE L. JACK.

If any readers have been to Montreal they would most likely see on the right hand shore opposite Lachine the straggling village of Caugnawaga, where live the remnant of the once powerful Iroquois, who were in the early days of the settlement of this country a terror to the white inhabitants, as you can read in the history of those times. So fierce they were, so cruel and teracherous, one scarcely believe them the same people. You could hardly fail to see some of them, for the men live by rafting, or act as pilots to the steamers that go down the rapids at Lachine. The chief among the pilots is Alentonni—better known as "Big John,"—who is quite vain in staid Indian fashion of his notoriety, and would introduce himself to you as "Me Big John, all folk know me;" which words he used to me one day when he came to my home, which is only five miles away. The village of Caugnawaga is within sight of the beautiful Mount Royal, after which the city at its feet was named, and no where else can be seen to such advantage the extremes of civilization, and the difference which cultivation makes in the human race. The reservation or land set apart by government as their own is poorly cultivated; there is a river frontage of seven miles, and the soil though rough and stony would bear good crops if properly cared for. In the village a stranger visiting the country misses the whitewash and appearance of thrift that is so attractive in the poorest hut of the French Canadian habitant. The houses have a quaint and ancient appearance, while in the open doorway during fine weather the women are seen at their beadwork, very rarely at domestic work of any other sort. The village is one long street, and the church, which aims at a Grecian architecture, is built on the bank of the river and contains some articles of historic interest. The bell that calls together the worshippers was presented by George Third, and over the altar is a fine picture of St. Louis of France, given to this church by Charles Tenth. There is also a gilt chalice, the gift of the ex-Empress Eugenie in her palmy days, and in the sacristy is a cape of cloth of gold, presented by Napoleon. The church service is held in the Iroquois language, and the singing is a wild, weird chant that cannot be described. Taking a party of American friends there once, the priest was found busy with a class of little girls preparing for first communion by teaching them the catechism in this very strange tongue, and their quick answers, and his profound devotion to duty, impressed the visitors very much. It is interesting to know that these dusky aborigines have a saint whose picture hangs on the walls of the church dressed in the gay trappings so becoming to her race. Her name is given to us as Tehgakwita, and she was baptized as a Christian on Easter day, 1670. The village schoolhouse is said to be the oldest building in the Dominion of Canada. It was once the residence of the military commander, and the Conte De Frontenac, whom you know well by the history, came here sometimes during his eventful career. Of course, you remember, too, the historian Pere Charlevoix, and it is interesting to see the room he used, still undisturbed, the pictures, desk and books still there, as when he wrote those famous letters to the Duchesse De Lesquereres in 1730.

For the last three years the Indians have attempted to improve their condition by holding a fair on the common below the village. The little white tents gleamed in the autumn sunshine as I went on to the grounds, and the faces of the natives shone with delight, while I could only think of that verse the beloved Whittier wrote:

> "Wild as the fruits he scorned to till
> These vales the idle Indian trod,
> Nor knew the glad creative skill—
> The joy of him who toils with God."

The vegetables were good, and I heard an old farmer, whose accent told that he was Scotch, remark—"No a bad show o' grain," as he passed the barley and oats and beans in the agricultural tent. A pathetic display of apples and grapes made me wish that horticulture was more fully developed, but the wild apples are so plentiful they have not yet felt the need of improved varieties. In one tent was beautiful beadwork, and moccasins so finely stitched as to appear a work of art, snow shoes and lacrosse sticks, and the fancy Indian baskets, with mats of corn husks, and other wares gave evidence of industry in their own peculiar workmanship; while the preserves and butter, fancy dressmaking, and good white bread showed creditable efforts in the art of civilized housekeeping. There were prizes for the handsomest papoose, and it was a funny sight to see the room of babies of all ages strapped on boards, which is the Indian cradle. Some of them were tastefully arranged at the head piece that projects over the top, and in the front of which is a curtain of lace with a valance of blue or pink silk. The board can stand against the wall or hang up in a tree as in the rhyme:

> "When the wind blows
> The cradle shall rock."

And really the round-eyed, and chubby, dusky-faced babies seemed the most contented in the world. Any one who went to look at the cattle soon found a source of amusement, and I followed the crowd to investigate the cause of mirth. Evidently the schoolmaster was absent, for an immense pig had a ticket attached to his head denoting that he was a "first prize spring lamb," and a particularly old and ferocious bull tossed on his horns a ticket stating that he was a "yearling calf," while a pretty speckled calf that looked out wistfully at the green grass beyond its pen, mentioned on its ticket that it was a "spring pig." These mistakes were due to the fact that the exhibitors had not a sufficient knowledge of English to arrange them correctly, but it was of course amusing to the lookers-on. The prize for the best dressed little girl was won by a child of ten in a garment of pale blue silk and velvet that contrasted inharmoniously with her dusky complexion, the judges ignoring a neatly dressed girl in brown merino, more to my taste, with a faint dash of scarlet, that was quite pretty. In the afternoon there were races on foot and on ponies, the latter being very exciting, as ten boys mounted on shaggy nags raced around the ring, and were to shoot an arrow at a target as they rode. Then came the "tog of war." White vs. Iroquois, and it was a long pull at a rope that became very exciting, but finally ended in the Indians' victory as they brought over the white strugglers against their will. After that the little girls had a race, and five small figures entered the ring, dressed in very picturesque costumes with gay trappings; at the word "go"—they shut their hands, visibly clenched their teeth, and pitched along head first. The referee evidently did not know them apart, for as the first panting figure reached the winning post, he inquired. "First?" "Me—White Eagle's girl," was answered. "Second?" "Big Crow's girl" said a bright-eyed child of twelve, and the three unsuccessful competitors shrank back while the prizes were presented, but rejoined their companions as they walked away. There were some fair attempts with brush and pencil, and some ingenious carpenter work, while a little girl of fourteen took the prize for plain sewing by hand.

An American lady, Mrs. Erminnie Smith, has taken great interest in these people, learning their language and enjoying their hospitality. Her influence is felt for good, for these children of the forest need some direct help in counsel and example from the world beyond them. Their young poet died last year, a youth who could improvise sonnets to the moon that if translated would be found as sweet and poetic as the rhapsodies of his white brother. He wore his hair long, not "lank," but curled, in thick waves around his neck, and his dark eyes had the dreamy look that was once attributed to true poets before "Pan" found his way to Wall street, and became so practical. This is only a beginning of what this remnant of a nation mean to do, and the next time you sail down the St. Lawrence and begin to feel the thrill of awe that strikes one at the near approach to the Lachine Rapids, I hope you will cast your eyes to the right, and see well cultivated fields and pleasant homesteads, as the result of the ambition that has stirred the hearts of the once powerful Iroquois of Caugnawaga.

A Dream of the Past.

BY MAUDE L. RADFORD.

I am sitting in the firelight,
Thinking sadly of the past,
Of the friends so long departed,
All are gone save me,—the last.

First I see my little sisters,
As they played about our door;
Now that happy home is broken—
All, yes all, are gone before.

Years passed on, and all was peaceful—
I had tasted of sweet joys—
I was then a happy mother,
Merry with my girls and boys.

Next a sadder scene awaits me:
Soft, the angel death is near,
Oh, my husband he is dying—
All the world seems dark and drear.

But my cup was overflowing;
My darlings left me, one by one,
And my human heart strived vainly
To say "God's own will be done"

Then I turned my sad heart upward,
Asking God to give me peace;
Give me courage to live this life,
Till my weary heart should cease.

And I got the strength I needed,
Over my sad heart he shed
Divine peace and consolation
And my hungry heart He fed.

Now I patiently am waiting
Till my trouble life is o'er,
Till I'm called unto my Father,
Resting peaceful evermore.

Went Down With the Ship.

Capt. Todd, of the British steamship "Sarah Ann," which sailed from Baltimore in February, and reached Galway, Ireland, in the latter part of March, reports that crossing the ocean, and while in lat. 23° north and lon. 65° 30', he fell in with a lot of wreckage, and Capt Todd scanned the horizon with his glass and two or three miles to the south he sighted a brigantine tossed about by the mountanous seas. The national colors of France and a flag of distress were flying from her masthead. Captain Todd steamed to the westward of the distressed vessel and attempted to rescue the sailors, but a small boat would not live in such a sea. By sprinkling oil on the sea he was enabled to secure comparatively smooth water, and a life boat from the steamship rescued four of the sailors. The captain, the mate and the cabin boy of the ship were deaf to the entreaties to abandon her, and they bade a last farewell to their comrades as they sailed away. As soon as they saw the rescued sailors were safe on board the steamship, they hauled down the signals of distress, went below, and an hour later the vessel sank with all on board. Her name was the "Dix Freres," and she was bound from Martinique, France, to Boston, Mass.

A Man Who Has Saved Many From Death.

(From Toronto Truth.)

It is not customary for us to laud an unworthy object, but when true merit is found we feel it only our duty to praise it. When the praise which is given may lead to the general benefit of mankind, then it should be more quickly given. There is one man whom we feel free to recommend. This gentleman is Mr. M. V. Luban, the proprietor of the great remedy for the cure of drunkenness, opium, morphine, chloral and kindred habits. There can be no mistake but that Luban's Specific Medicines effect a permanent cure. We have seen letters from men and women, upon whom the dread curse of drink and morphine had fixed itself, who are to-day thoroughly cured. The medicine is no humbug, or it would not have stood the test so long. But apart from this, we would have confidence in the medicine from our confidence in the man. The opium, morphine or drinking habit, is a curse so insidious in its approach and so blasting in its results as to appal wherever seen. The morphine habit is worse than drunkenness and creeps upon its victims so imperceptibly that they are bound soul and body before they are aware of its approach. If this notice falls under the eyes of any person cursed by morphine or whisky, we tell them that they may rid themselves of the habit if they choose. To briefly and pointedly close this article we say if you suffer from the excessive use of alcohol or morphine, send your address for Luban's Treatise in book form on drunkenness, opium, morphine and kindred habits. The book gives a full discription of the remedy and contains testimonials from those who have been cured. Note: the medicine may be given in tea or coffee and without the knowledge of the person taking it, if so desired. Address, M. V. LUBAN, 47 Wellington St. East, Toronto, Canada.

AN EGYPTIAN ROMANCE.

A Story of Love and Wild Adventure, founded upon Startling Revelations in the Career of Arabia Pasha.

CHAPTER LIV.

THE MOST TERRIBLE OF ALL PERILS, AND HOW NELLIE WAS PRESERVED.

Leaving the two Europeans in pursuit of ur thousand Egyptians, who were executing a retrograde movement, we will revert to the fortunes, or rather the misfortunes, of our lovely Nellie and her parents.

The trio were closely guarded and not even allowed to hold speech with one another.

Nellie could not help perceiving how the pick of an hour had fallen in the common estimation.

She heard his conduct being discussed in loud tones, but in no measured terms, on all sides of her.

Such grumbling created in her heart a new alarm, for did the war minister lose his high position he would be no longer able to protect her and her parents, and they would assuredly lose their lives.

Whilst these fears and apprehensions disturbed her mind Arabi Pasha himself had trouble enough to endure in turn.

He was continually beset by some officer of distinction or other proffering his advice, and sometimes almost insisting on his counsel being followed.

After a monotonous fourteen miles' march over the level, sandy, treeless plain, the little village of Kafr Dowa was reached, where, though well-nigh exhausted, the troops were at once set to throw up earthworks across the narrow isthmus, as a safeguard against any possible landing and advance of the British in that direction, while not far in the rear of the working parties Arabi had a gorgeous pavilion erected, which had been brought for his special use from Alexandria.

It was furnished with an abundance of Turkish rugs and cushions, the dressed skins of different wild animals and with every other appurtenance that would render both sumptuous and luxurious the tent of an Oriental commander-in-chief.

After he had perused sundry dispatches and issued all necessary orders, to this splendid pavilion was brought Nellie Donelly by one of the guards.

The war minister received her with the utmost deference, and when her conductor had taken his departure he turned to her with a smile and, holding her meanwhile by an arm, exclaimed:

"How does my wife like our quarters? Are they not very comfortable?"

The fair girl caught his meaning in an instant and her heart seemed to stand still.

"Oh, where are my father and mother?" she cried. "I thought that they also were being brought hither."

"A wife's place is at her husband's side, both night and day, and when she marries she is understood to leave both father and mother and to cleave only unto him."

"But I am not your wife. I was no consenting party. I was already married."

"Those wild statements have been refuted again and again, even from your father's and mother's lips. We Orientals cannot understand parents not being able to dispose of their daughters as they list, nor is such an anomaly comprehended in Christian countries in which I have sojourned. Besides, the priest of your faith declared that you are were not rightly married to your countryman who ran away with you, while I am very sure that you are rightly married unto me. For these several and good reasons I call you my wife, and from this morning I swear by Allah and the prophet that you shall share the same tent and the same couch with me. I have said it."

An expression of stony despair came into Nellie's face.

She gazed for a moment distractedly round at all the Oriental pomp and splendor by which she was surrounded, but they failed to fire her ambition or to dazzle her imagination, as her Moslem lord had doubtless hoped that they would do.

The carved bamboo poles bent to the desert wind that had just sprung up and the crimson damask lining of the magnificent tent glittered till the myriads of bunches of forget-me-nots that were embroidered thereon seemed to be instinct with life and, as they met her view, Nellie remembered that a blue forget-me-not was the last flower that Frank Donelly had ever given to her.

This recollection it was which restored to her the courage and resolution that was an essential part of her character, and she plucked from Arabi's belt the revolver that was carelessly thrust therein, and presenting the muzzle at his very forehead, declared in a voice which desperation rendered firm that she would pull the trigger if he did not let her go.

"Is your hatred to me so great as all that?" demanded Arabi as he recoiled.

"My love of my husband and my honor is as great as that and greater. I care little whether I destroy you or myself. If it really is a noble cause which you are supporting and your life is indispensable to its success, tell me so and I will point the weapon toward my weak and worthless self. Welcome death a thousand times rather than a life spent with you in the character of your third or even your second wife."

An involuntary admiration of her conduct seized upon the war minister then. He felt instinctively that such a girl must possess a soul, no matter though the tenets of his creed declared to the contrary, and his brows contracted more with the weight of thought than under the influence of anger as he said in scarcely audible accents:

"You have doubtly disarmed me. You are safe. You may lower that weapon."

By the time that he had finished speaking not only had they quitted his own sumptuous pavilion, but they had also gained a lesser tent, behind the flaps of whose canvas Nellie could plainly distinguish the voices of her father and mother."

"I will not come in with you," said Arabi. "I have lost all esteem for your parents, and I care not to hold converse with those whom I have ceased to respect. You can tell them that within a quarter of an hour you will all three be journeying by special train to Cairo, for the station is not a hundred yards away, and whither you will be taken when you arrive there. The protectors that I shall give unto you may be perfectly relied on, for they are men who know that their future rests with me, so even their selfish interests will make them faithful to their trust. And now farewell."

As he concluded the war minister raised the lovely girl's hand to his lips and kissed it fervently—almost, indeed, reverentially. Then he raised the flap of the tent for her to enter it thereunder, and when she had disappeared from his sight he sighed and returned alone to his gorgeous pavilion, muttering to himself the while:

"I wonder if I have acted as an honorable man or simply as a fool."

CHAPTER LV.

LOST AMONGST MOUNTAINS—NEARLY RUN TO EARTH.

Two Europeans, wan, half starved and in every way wretched, begirt by as many perils as ever was the Apostle Paul, are wandering alone in the desert, attempting to make their way overland toward some part or other of the Suez Canal.

Not to make a mystery of the matter, they are none other than Frank Donelly and his devoted follower, Pat Monaghan, whom in the chapter before the last we beheld setting out from Alexandria in the dead of night on a most Quixotic and hopeless errand, as any but a lover and an Irishman would have perceived from the very first.

At last, one moonlight night, they had been perceived prowling in the neighborhood of an advanced picket, actually in the rear of the Egyptian lines (a hanging matter according to every military code in existence), so that a troop of horse had been sent in pursuit of them, and these, turning their flank and cutting them off from Alexandria, had chased them for fifteen miles out into the desert, and from that time whenever they had sought to return they had encountered some body of Bedouin horse or other, who drove them first in one direction and then in another, till at last (although they as yet had managed to keep clear of hostile lead and steel) they were altogether lost, and no more knew the way back to Alexandria than the way to reach the moon.

They had been lost for more than a month now, and all that while they have wandered to and fro in a weird wild region of hill and mountain, with large stretches of desert between hills rounded at the tops, bare of verdure and hideously monotonous of aspect, so that one can hardly be distinguished from another, which makes it all the more difficult to get out of this apparently enchanted region, and often after attempting it for a whole day they have found themselves at sunset close to where they started from at sunrise.

Even in this terrible region, however, there is an oasis to be found at intervals wide apart, each with a natural spring in its centre (whence, undoubtedly, its existence), and adorned at the least with fig and date trees, fruit than which in a clime like Egypt nothing more is wanted to support life.

One morning just at dawn, Frank Donelly started as they were in the act of saddling their horses and exclaimed in excited tones to his companion, "Did you not hear it?"

"Begorra, an' bad cess to that same, I can only hear the barking of a fox."

"You aren't troubling to listen. I wish you would, for I want your opinion about it."

"Be jabers, I can hear it now, your honor. There must be a nest of 'em close by."

"A nest of what, Pat? What on earth do you make it out to be then?"

"Why, if it ain't the buzzing of the most thundering bumble bees or hornets I'm blessed."

"It sounds to me a deal more like the rush of steam through the 'scape pipe of a distant steamer. It seemed familiar to me the instant that I heard it."

"I wish it was, yer honor, but steamers don't come tearing across deserts."

"No, Pat, but in many places the desert stretches to the very banks of the Suez Canal, which is traversed by ocean steamers continually. Let us up and away and at once make in the direction of the sound. There is hope for us yet, my boy."

"If there is, begorra, here comes a pack of those brown Bedouin devils determined to do their best to cut us off from it. We've not a moment to lose, yer honor."

There was no need to lose even half a minute, for the horses were already saddled, and they had but to leap upon their backs, gather up the reins and kick the corners of their shoe-shaped stirrups against their bony ribs in lieu of spurs.

This done away they sped with the speed of the very wind out of the fertile oasis and across the brown desert sand, whilst the Bedouins, who had evidently hoped to steal down upon them unperceived, rent the air with their shrill and angry cries and brandished their long spears on high.

The monotonous sound still continued, and the fugitives guided their horses in its direction. If it was what Frank Donelly supposed it to be 'twas still a long way off, and by the time they had reached the canal the steamer, from which he almost hoped against hope that it proceeded, might have passed quite out of sight.

Then all at once it struck him: Was the canal still open?

He was aware that the war minister had threatened to destroy it on the firing of the first hostile cannon against Alexandria.

If he had kept his word, the supposed steamer was a myth, and the strange humming noise was caused by something that might be hostile instead of friendly to them.

These were anything but agreeable doubts and fears.

As a drowning man clutches at a straw, so, however, did Captain Donelly and Pat Monaghan hang on desperately to this, their almost remaining hope, as they sped on and on across the level plain and around one hill after another, the continuously humming sound alone enabling them to steer a tolerably straight course.

The Bedouins hung as perseveringly on their trail, however, as grim death spurs his white horse hard on the track of plague, pestilence or famine, and every time they ventured to look back their pursuers seemed to have gained on them, whilst that they themselves were aware of the fact was evident from their frequent exulting shouts and the continual frantic brandishing of lance and matchlock.

A wild and ferocious looking set they were, with their long beards, floating scarlet headdresses, bronzed, hair naked forms and enormous swords slung over their backs; whilst their horses looked almost equally ferocious, with their tossing heads and streaming manes and tails, and those other tails dyed bright red that dangled and swayed from their picturesque harness.

"Pat, unless Providence is especially looking after us, they'll run us to earth."

This at last, in almost despairing tones, came from Pat's master; but Monaghan's thoroughly characteristic reply was:

"Bedad, yer honer, an' it's hard to say; but for myself. I feel in better spirits now that there's something more to rouse me up than the flies an' other stinging an' worriting creatures. An' besides, we've pulled through almost as bad before."

"Well, Pat, we can but do our best; and, by Jove, that we will do to the last gasp."

They spoke no more, but strained every nerve to prevent the Bedouins gaining ground.

Their sole comfort was that that half humming and half shrieking noise was more plainly audible than ever in their front, and decidedly very much nearer.

But sound is very uncertain in some states of the atmosphere, and the still, balmy air of Egypt bears sound at all times a long way, so that it might be still miles distant.

And now the Bedouins slung their lances and handled their matchlocks, the next instant discharging them whilst at full gallop, according to their usual custom.

The bullets buzzed past the ears of the fugitives like wasps and they made the most unpleasant discovery that they were already within range.

To turn at bay upon more than a score of foes would, however, have been positive madness, and so they still continued their flight, a flight that now appeared to be hopeless.

A big hill was directly before them, obstructing all view behind.

"If there's no succor on the other side of that we will sell our lives at the best price we can get for them, Pat," said Frank Donelly, as he carefully examined his revolver.

"Ye may well say that," was Monaghan's response, "for my nag is about dead beat as it is."

The Bedouins perceived this as well, and their cries became like those of hungry wolves.

Donelly involuntarily drew in his own steed somewhat, determined that he wouldn't place himself by so much as a single yard in a safer position than that occupied by his brave and faithful follower.

The horses were both reeling rather than galloping now, but in another minute, as the base of the rocky hill was rounded, both officer and man almost shrieked with delight at what they beheld, for not five hundred yards in front of them was a narrow strip of red water, and an enormous white-hulled transport flying the British Union Jack lying motionless in the centre, whilst her bulwarks were crowded with red-jacketed, white peak-helmeted soldiers, gazing with eager curiosity in their direction, doubtless owing to the report of the Bedouin matchlocks having reached their ears.

Three minutes later Captain Donelly and Pat had gained the bank of the canal, whilst the Bedouins, swooping round the base of the hill, in turn received such a deadly carbine fire from the deck of the British transport that half of their saddles were emptied, whereupon the survivors shrieked, wheeled round and disappeared behind the hill again with a quickness that did more credit to horse than man.

CHAPTER LVI.

THE DEATH RIDE AT EL MAGFAR—THE FIRST VICTORY.

Ten minutes later Captain Donelly and Pat Monaghan were safe aboard the British transport Greece, which had been waiting for as much as a couple of hours in the Narrows of Atabet for a pilot to navigate her through Lake Timsah to the town of Ismailia, where, according to instructions of the commander-in-chief, her living freight was to be put ashore.

Both officer and man were glad enough to find themselves amongst fellow-countrymen, and more especially red coats, but how was their satisfaction increased when, directly they set foot on the transport's decks, the "Fourth D. G." on the shoulder straps of the soldiers who thronged around informed them of the most agreeable fact that they were with the Royal Irish Dragoon Guards, by nickname "The Happy Family," and in short, their own regiment.

"Thought you'd turn up somewhere or other, old fellow," exclaimed one officer.

"Hardly in such a Mazeppa-like fashion, though," added another. "I never beheld a more exciting steeplechase in my life. Well ridden, too."

Thus, amidst jests and congratulations, was their brother officer escorted to the saloon, while the troopers lugged Pat Monaghan off to the ship canteen to treat him to what he had for weeks been longing for and dreaming of and chiefly talking about, and what he had taken to calling the "three blessed B.'s," namely, bread, beef, and beer.

We are getting so near to the end of our tale that we find we have no time to waste over table talk. It was the officers' breakfast hour and Frank Donelly was quite ready for the meal. When he had briefly narrated his own adventures and listened in turn to plenty of divers opinions concerning the campaign, all parties holding the unanimous conviction, however, that they would be cressing swords with the Egyptains within a very few hours at most, he excitedly exclaimed:

"I wish to heaven that I had a horse and a uniform, so that I might join you."

"Faith, and I don't see what's to prevent your doing that same," responded the regimental surgeon, a genial cove of Cork, as he was in general facetiously termed. "There's Captain Murphy down with fever, which he made worse through being in too great a hurry to recover, but I'm sure he'll feel a deal of satisfaction to think his coat has a chance of being in the thick of the fun even if he has to remain outside it. He's a man of just your own build, Captain Donelly, and his horse is one just after your own heart, I'm sure."

"Are there any sick amongst the men, so that my fellow Pat may have an equal chance?"

"There's just three, who, I fear, will have small hope of drawing sabres before the time has come to sheath them, and I've no doubt your man will find that out and not let such an opportunity slip."

"No, I'll be sworn that he won't," replied Frank. "And I'll wager, too, that he'll do the work of any three ordinary men, if only previously well fortified with beef and beer."

Two hours later the Greece was discharging her living freight upon the quay at Ismailia, and some of the dragoons were sent off to the front as quickly as they could be got into their saddles.

* * * * * * * *

A few words of explanation are essential here in order that the reader may know what the British troops were about so far away from Alexandria.

The fact was that when the commander-in-chief, Sir Garnet Wolseley, arrived at Alexandria on the 25th of August, he found that Arabi Pasha had raised such formidable batteries at Kafr Dowar (where we left him in the chapter before last) that he completely blocked the short and straight road to Cairo, and so effectually that a fearful loss of life must have been the result of any attempt to force a way in that direction.

So, four days after his arrival, Sir Garnet re-embarked more than half his army, ostensibly with the object of attacking the forts in Aboukir bay and there effecting a landing; and, having deceived not only the enemy, but a host of troublesome and mischievous newspaper correspondents by the carefully spread report, he accomplished the most brilliant ruse known in modern warfare by steaming on far past the anticipated point of attack and seizing the whole length of the Suez canal, thus in less than twenty-four hours most successfully accomplishing a complete strategic change of base, bringing himself nearer to the capital of Egypt by a good fifty miles than he was at Alexandria, striking directly at Arabi Pasha's communication therewith and turning and rendering perfectly useless the formidable works at Kafr Dowar, which had taken him more than a month to construct.

Thus was the outgeneraled Egyptian compelled to show an entirely new front in the Valley of the Sweet Water canal, which canal he, however, promptly dammed up, in an attempt to cut off the only sources of water supply available to the British troops, whose position for a while was critical enough, in the neighborhood of Ismailia, at all events; for, independent of the water difficulty, Arabi had the railway at his command and, no sooner had the two thousand men and a couple of guns been thrown ashore, than ten thousand Egyptians, with a battery of a dozen Krupp cannons, came steaming down from Zag-a-Zig, resolved to drive the whole of the little force into Lake Timsah.

It was the quick approach of the Egyptians which had caused the dragoon guards to betake themselves speedily to their saddles the very minute that their horses were slung ashore, and no sooner were they mounted than a couple of squadrons were sent forward to reconnoitre, one on the right side of the bank in the direction of Nepthe and the other on the left bank toward El Magfar.

Captain Donelly had been given the command of the latter squadron and he nominated Pat Monaghan his orderly.

The instructions were to be on the alert, to advance in line when the ground was sufficiently open for such a formation, and generally to feel the way as far as El Magfar, there to discover what the enemy were about and if possible obtain a clue as to what they meant doing.

"Threes about! march! trot!" and out flashed the sabres and away filed the dragoons in sections of threes, all in the highest spirits at the near prospect of a brush with the foe.

After they had proceeded for about a league, from behind a small but dense patch of scrub Frank Donelly thought that he distinguished the glitter of steel. He was about to send half a dozen men forward to reconnoitre, when he was saved all trouble on that score by the enemy suddenly revealing himself in the shape of a well-mounted regiment of Egyptian horse, who came spurring from the rear of the scrub, brandishing their lances as though they thoroughly meant mischief.

In numbers they were thrice the strength of the British, whilst their horses were in fine condition. They thus had the advantage in every way. But of course retreat was not to be thought of, and so Captain Donelly, as he cast loose his holster flaps and then waved his sword, shouted out:

"Trot! gallop! charge! Give them the point, lads, when you can, and remember all of you to watch your opponent's eye and not his blade!"

The Egyptian cavalry did not stop to receive them, but, waiting until their foes were almost within pistol shot of them, they parted to left and right, made a rapid retrograde movement in two columns, whilst at the very moment that they thus divided asunder a puff of white smoke and a flash of red flames broke through the patch of scrub and a shell came hurtling through the air and fell plump amongst the dragoons, causing their horses to rear, plunge and shriek.

The ruse of the Egyptain cavalry had explained itself. Their sole intention had been to tempt the British dragoons within point blank range of their masked battery, and they had effected their fell design, for, "Hur-r-r! Hur-r-r! Hur-r-r!" came three more of the small howitzer shells, and one trooper's head was whipped clean from off his shoulders and the bowels of another torn out and scattered all his horse and saddle trappings.

Every one looked anxiously toward their leader, wondering what his next command would be.

"Oh! On! We daren't let it be poured at us in retreat, and the boldest course is the safest!"

They saw it was so; but had they not it would have been all the same. The long brass trumpets sounded the "gallop," and the dragoons went straight at the scrub.

The noise was deafening, the smoke was blinding, but in they burst and on they rushed, and in another couple of minutes they were through the scrub and sabering the artillerymen at their guns, whilst the Egyptian cavalry, who might have made mince meat of them whilst so engaged, seized with a wild panic, galloped away across the desert, leaving guns and gunners alike to their fate, and in the deadly melee Captain Donelly, who exposed himself most fearlessly, would more than once have met his own but for the valor and the fidelity of Pat Monaghan.

Training the Children.

Children should be spared from sorrow as much as possible; their sunshine of hope and joy should never be dimmed, so as to leave them without even the memory of its glory. The perfume of a thousand roses soon dies, but the pain caused by one of their thorns remains long after; a saddened remembrance in the midst of mirth is like that "thorn among the roses."

When an accident occurs, learn whether it was through misfortune, carelessness or wilfulness before you pass sentence. Accidents are frequently of great service, and children often learn more caution and gain more real information from their occurrence than from fifty lessons. Be it remembered that the perfection of science is owing to the occurrence and remedy of its early accidents.

There can be no greater mistake than to consider children as destitute of understanding; their understanding should rather be appealed to and consulted. Most of us remember being imposed upon in youth and how our elders sought sometimes to put us off with evasive answers or insufficient explanations; how they told us some plausible story as an excuse or as a reason; we also remember that even in our youth and simplicity we were quite capable of seeing through their manœuvers.

Now I do not believe in this sort of thing. There should be no stifling of truth and no relaxation of duty. If, as often will happen, it is not expedient or proper for the children to know a particular fact or incident, they should be told so with kindness and frankness, but at the same time with firmness. I am afraid parents are too apt to overlook the intelligence of their children and address themselves to their stature; they forget the mind, which is invisible, in the presence of matter, which is seen.

The treatment of children must always, for their own sakes, differ much from that of adults. Our manner of addressing them must also be different; but there does not seem to be any reason why we should not give them full credit for the amount of intelligence they do possess. We may every day see children with more discrimination, greater good sense, of better regulated moral deportment, than many whose tall figure or riper age has invested them with the consequence of men and women.

A Bulgarian Heroine.

The Widdin correspondent of the St. Petersburg Novesti sends to that newspaper the following account of a young Bulgarian girl who took an active part in the late war against Servia, distinguishing herself at Slivnitza and at Pirot, and received two crosses for bravery. Previous to the outbreak of hostilities she joined a company of militia—such companies were then forming in various parts of Bulgaria—and accompanied it to the southern frontier in the hope of there meeting with the enemy. During some time she managed to conceal her sex, for her comrades took her to be a youth with an effeminate face, of which there were many such to be met with among the militia. Only the commander of her company knew her secret; she was obliged to disclose it to him when the company had set out upon its march, and he appears to have loyally kept it to himself. In all exercises, parades and reviews she took part jointly with her male comrades. At last, when Servia declared war against Bulgaria, the heroine took part in the forced march into Servia, fought at the battle of Slivnitza, and joined in the attack upon Pirot. During the fight she did all she could to encourage her comrades, and they in return unanimously voted to her the company's medal for bravery. When, in consequence of the war coming to an end, the militia was dispersed she went to Sofia and was there presented to Prince Alexander, who awarded her a second decoration for bravery. She then returned to Widdin, her place of domicile before the war, where she acts as servant to an old lady. She says that should the Servians begin another war she will again fight against them, but in her woman's attire, for it is not worth while to change one's dress for such an enemy.

MARKDALE APRIL 22, 1886

MARKDALE SPRING SHOW.

The best Spring Fair ever held in Morkdale took place last Tuesday. The weather was gorgeous, and the exhibit both large and very fine. Trimble & Pickell's imported Clydesdale, "Lord Derby," was much admired by all. There is perhaps no better horse in Canada of his class. The exhibit altogether was indeed creditable, and worthy of a much more lengthy notice than our space will permit. There was altogether 16 entries.

W. & J. Anderson's thoroughbred Durham bull is a fine young animal, and A. Cairns showed a good Ayrshire both of which secured a prize. Great satisfaction was expressed for fair play and good management.

W. J. McFARLAND, Esq.:

DEAR SIR,—I have just finished making about 50 pounds of the best Maple Syrup you ever set eyes on; and I have heard so much about Markdale that I just make up my mind that I would see that village and trade off my Syrup for Store Goods. So says I to my old man, I am going down to Markdale; and, says he, you aint going to take any Syrup, as us and the children can eat Syrup just as well as those stuck up villagers; but you'd better take some money so that if you see some cheap goods down there you can buy them. Well, Sir, I went down, and there was Markdale as large as life. The first nice building I saw was one of the allfredest nicest houses I ever saw, and I stopped and asked who owned it, and was told Dr Sproule. Well, it beats all what the N. P. will do for some people. I strolled round town, visited several stores and finally got into your store. I saw Mr. Bowes, Andy Mc., Charley Lawrence and Bert Casson. I heard that they were not too accommodating and were slow; but, to my surprise, they were active and busy, and no sooner had I stepped in the door than one of them began to show me the New Goods which had just arrived from England. As soon as he told me the prices I began to think of the money the old man gave me. The first I priced was Dress Goods and when he showed me your All Wool Dress Goods for 25 cents per yard, I smiled, then he smiled, then we both smiled; I couldn't stand it longer, so I took 20 yards; then I bought a pair of Lace Curtains, tony, only $1.00, which beats everything I ever saw; then he showed me some Cheap Boots & Shoes, I bought a pair of all leather water-tight for the sugar bush for $1.35; then I took a look at your Hand Sewed Boots for men, the best I ever saw, price $3.50. My Jack was with me, says he, mother, I must have a pair of these here Boots. Just when he was trying them on (a pair of 10's) up you slipped and said to me, your boy is built both for strength and activity, legs like a deer and feet like a bear. Jack didn't like it much, but the Boots were so cheap that he took a pair. We then went over to the Grocery counter and sampled your Tea. Now, if there is anything in this world I know when I see, it is good Tea, and I was so pleased with your thirty (30) cent Japan Tea that I took the largest box I could get (67 lbs.) We then went up stairs and took a look through your Clothing, and it was so good and cheap and fitted so well that Jack was bound to have a suit: I just had $4.00 left, so Jack went down into his breeches pocket with his left hand and brough out a handful of tobacco and silver and picked out $3.50, so we put it together and bought him the suit. As soon as I go home and get some more money I am coming back to get the old man one of your cheap suits. I priced nearly all the different kinds of goods you had, and no mistake they are the cheapest and best I have seen for years, and I will not hesitate to tell my neighbors. Your Millinery Goods are just the loveliest I ever clapped eyes on, and Mary Jane, she teaches school up on the 7th, will come in and get a Hat, Parisol, and other fixins. She and Joe is going to get spliced this fall and will want a lot of stuff. Take it all in, you beat the hull country, and I am not giving you any taffy either. I will be down again soon. Wishing you continued prosperity and good health,

Yours faithfully,

MRS. MARY JANE PEPPER.

P. S.—Come up and bring the misses and have a Taffy Pull.

From our own correspondent.

Died at his residence on Thursday evening last, Mr. Jeremiah Taylor, after a lingering and painful illness. Deceased was one of the pioneer settlers of this township; with careful economizing and hard labor had accumulated a good share of this world's goods; leaves a widow and family in comfortable circumstances.

LOST ON THURSDAY LAST.—Mr. W. Petch, butcher of this town, on his way out to a farmer's place, about 8 miles distant, where he had bought some beef cattle, lost from his coat pocket a purse containing $25.00 in cash and a promiscry note for $30.00. Diligent search was made over the road which he had driven, but no trace of lost yet found.

$13.00.—A Protonite in Dundalk a few days ago, becoming rather unruley tried some pugilistic exercise on one of the residents of that town, where upon a charge was laid before our J. P., J. W. Armstrong, Esq., against the offender. Forthwith Constable Field was dispatched to summons all parties concerned, when a good number appeared here on Friday afternoon. The prisoner pleaded guilty, and after playing to the tune of $13.00 in cash was allowed to return to his home, we trust a wiser and better man.

Mrs. A. Maloy and family left our midst on Tuesday morning last en route for Atchison City, Kansas. On Saturday evening last Mrs. Maloy was made the recipient of a very handsome set of China tableware accompanied by a very kindly worded address by the ladies of the Presbyterian church here.

JOE GALES (WEST LIBERTY), 2-28.

The following estimate of this well known trotting stallion appeared in the Canadian Sportsman of April 9th, 1886:—

Very few horsemen in Western Ontario have appeared more favorably before the public during the last few years than Mr. Jas. R. Trimble, of Markdale. For several years he swept the board at fairs with his beautiful bay horse Clear Grit, Jr., and was awarded in 1884 the highest honors by the judges at the Toronto Industrial Fair. He also showed with marked success in the heavy classes, and now he is to the front with a standard trotting stallion, and one, too, that is not only sired by the sire of trotters, but has proved himself to be a trotter having a mark of 2.28 to his credit.

The great question among the breeders of to-day is, what horse will make a successful sire? Shall he select one that has speedy brothers and sisters and no phenomenal speed himself although his breeding is above question or one that has both breeding and performance, especially the latter, on his side? It goes without saying that the question is a hard one, for if a man purchases a horse that has campaigned for several years he will have reached a good old age before his colts begin coming to the front. If, on the other hand a colt is put in the stud and never asked to stand the severe strain of many a hard fought race, his get will be in the trainers hands ere he himself has reached maturity, and his opportunities for producing a flyer is a hundred times as great as the campaigner. Had George Wilkes been placed in the stud as early as his sire, Rysdyk's Hambletonian, instead of having forty-one representatives in the 2.30 list to-day he might have a hundred and forty-two.

Joe Gales (West Liberty) is a chesnut horse foaled 1869 and stands 15 hands two inches. He was sired by Wapsie (688) the sire of General Grant 2.21 and Glenwood 2.27¼; dam not traced. Wapsie was sired by Green's Bashaw, the sire of Josephus 2.19¾ Fred Douglas 2.20¼, Hambletonian Bashaw 2.21¼, Rose of Washington 2.21¾ Kirkwood 2.24, Bashaw jr. 2.24½, Wagner Bashaw 2.25¼. Amboy 2.26. Green Charley 2.26¼, General Lee 2.26¼, Tom Kirkwood 2.29¼, Wild Oats 2.29¼. Josephine 2.30 and Robert Burns 2.30; dam by Hempstead's Joe Gales (thoroughbred). Besides producing Wapsie the sire of three in the 2.30 list Green's Bashaw sired Amboy (2.26) with five, Kirkwood (2.24) with three, and Bashaw Drury, Iowa Chief, Wagner Bashaw and Wild Bashaw with one each in the 2.30 list. He also sired the dams of Fulton Maid 2.29¼, Gypsey Boy 2.28, Joe Young 2.25¼, Princess 2.29½, Trampoline 2.23¼ and Western 2.25¼.

Green's Bashaw was sired by Vernol's Black Hawk by Long Island Black Hawk, (24), the sire of Prince 2.24½, and Jake Oakley who trotted a mile in 2.32½ thirty years ago; dam Belle by Tom Thumb, a Canadian horse of unknown blood, but a trotter of great speed and endurance; 2nd dam and Charles Kent mare the dam of Rysdyk's Hambletonian who not only proved himself to be a great sire of speed and to-day stands third on the list of speed producing sires, but also stands without a peer as the sire of speed producers as even his grand and great grand children are to day producing phenomenal performers.

Joe Gales was bred by J. L. Wilson, West Liberty, Iowa, the owner of Wapsie, his sire, and was considered one of the most promising stallions in the State and had he not met with the misfortune of breaking his ankle he would have been one of the fastest; and even to-day, after severe campaigning and misfortunes, he can show a quarter on any good track at a 2.25 clip. He is as pretty as a picture, his beautiful head, with that game never-say-die gleam in his eyes, well set on a rangy neck sinking into a pair of massive shoulders for a horse of his stature. His barrel is well ribbed up, coupling strong and quarter powerful, while his legs and feet are above criticism. He trots off naturally, wearing neither boots or weights, and is as pure and level gaited as any horse living.

Joe Gales (West Liberty) trotted his first race at Welton, Iowa August 22nd, 1872, and won in straight heats in slow time, His next appearence was at Devenport, September 9th, 1874, when he defeated Gertrude, who won the first and third heats, Mark Twain and Infant being distanced; time 2.57¾, 2.54½, 2.46¾, 2.52¾, 2.47¾. He won another streight-heat-race in September, 1876 getting a mark of 2.39, which he reduced the following month to 2.35½, at Virginia, Ill., where he defeated Mary C., Jacksonville Boy, General Singleton, and Messenger Golddust, the last two being distanced. It was in the 1877 campaign, however, that the game son of Wapsie came to the front. His first great performance was at Freeport, Ill., May 31st, 1877, where he won the second heat in a race in 2.28 his present record. This was followed by a victory, at Dubuque, Ill., where on June 7th he defeated the roan gelding, Loafer (2.24½), who won the first heat in 2.28, and was distanced in the 4th, and Amy B., who won the second in 2.31, 2.32, 2.33, 2.35. The same field met the following week at Cedar Rapids, and Loafer won; but Joe Gales won the second and fourth heats in 2.28½, 2.29, and drove him out in 2.28, 2.30¼ and 2.29.

After defeating Wandering Jew, Sparkle and Fulton in a five heat race at Battle Axe, Michigan, he was brought to Canada, where he has won several good races. Starting in a free-for-all at Forest, May 24th, 1883, he won in streight heats, defeating Rattling Dan, Comet and Fulton, who drove him out in one heat in 2.29. He defeated Fulton and Tom Jefferson in stright heats over the same track in September of that year for a purse of $200, his best time being 2.33¼.

As a prize winner Joe Gales (West Liberty), 2.28, has few equals, having swept the board wherever shown. The East Lambton Fair Association awarded him first prize and diploma on three occasions. He also carried off first prize and silver medal at the London Fall Fair against fourteen entries. He was awarded first prize and a diploma at the Sarnie Spring Fair in 1883, and a gold medal at the Fall Fair of the same association for the best trotting stallion on the ground

HOME RULE.

CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.

The Queen would be empowered to ...ve to him any prerogatives she now ...gral or would enjoy. The religious disa... ...ow existing which makes Roman ...olics ineligible to this office would be re... With regard to the judges who had ...n concerned in the administration of the ...ion law in Ireland, Her Majesty might, ...e saw cause by Order in Council

ANTEDATE THE PENSIONS

...those particular judges. In future the ...ges would be appointed by the Irish Gov... ...ment, be paid out of the consolidated fund, ...d be removable only on the joint address ...f the two orders. The constabulary would ...n under the present terms of service ...d under their present authority. The ...ce for the constabulary was now £1,500,... ...r per annum, and the speaker felt confi... ...t the charge would be reduced, but for the ...esent he proposed to RELIEVE THE IRISH

...slative body of all expenditure from the ...nstabulary in excess of £1,000,000 per ...num. The Government had no desire to ...ompt the peace of Ireland in reference to ...final position from the ultimate control ...the Irish legislative body. The speaker ...d no jealousy upon that subject, as the ...ct of providing for the ordinary security of ...e and property was the first duty of

A LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

With respect to the Civil Service the ...overnment did not think their case was the ...me as that of the constabulary, and the ...nsfer of the Civil Service to the legislative ...dy would effect a great economy. He ...o before thought it would be wise to author... ...the civil servants now serving to claim ...e pensions that would be due to them upon ...e abolition of their offices provided they ...ved two years in order

TO PREVENT INCONVENIENCE

...m a rapid transition of the service, and at ...e close of that time both parties should be ...e to negotiate afresh. That was all. Mr. ...adstone stated, that he had to say on the ...ject of the new Irish Constitution. The ...portion of the Imperial burdens which he ...n to propose that Ireland should bear was ...one to fourteen. He thought the new ...sh Parliament ought to start with a ...lance to its credit, but the only fund that ...would have if left alone would be the ...itary £20,000 from the Irish Church fund. ...e knew no way of providing

THE NECESSARY MONEY

...cept by craving it out of this year's ...dget, and he proposed that in the future ...eland should pay one fifteenth towards the ...perial expenditure. He went on to speak ...f how much Ireland would gain by exporting ...its to Great Britain, and how much Great ...itain would lose to Ireland by the flow of ...ney from one to the other. As the result ...careful enquiry, he stated with confidence, ...t as an actual demonstration, but as a ...tter of certainty with regard to the far ...ater portion, that the

IRISH RECEIPTS WOULD GAIN

from Great Britain a sum that would ...ount to no less a total than £1,400,000 per ...num. He then entered into an elaborate ...culation of the total income and expend... ...re of Ireland, in the course of which he ...ated that the total charge to Ireland as an ...perial contribution would be £3,242,000 ...r annum. He stated as an instance of the

INTENSE DEMORALIZATION

...f the present Irish administration, that, ...hile the post-office in England showed a ...rge surplus, in Ireland it just paid its ex...ses. He estimated the total expenditure ...f Ireland, including a payment as a sinking ...nd for the Irish position of the national ...bt, at £7,946,000 per annum. Against ...s there was a total income of £8,350,000, ...a

SURPLUS TO TEH GOOD

...f £404,000. "It has naturally been said in ...ngland and Scotland," continued Mr. Glad... ...one, "that for a great many years past we ...ave been struggling to pass good laws for ...reland, and that we have sacrificed our time, ...neglected our interists, and paid our money, ...and we have done all this in the endeavor ...to give Ireland good laws. That is quite true ...with regard to the general course of legislation. ...Many of those laws have been passed under ...an influence which I can hardly describe any ...other than as the INFLUENCE OF FEAR."

With regard to the history of the land ques... ...tion, no man could know that until he had ...followed it from year to year, begining with ...the Devon Commission, the appointment of ...which, in the speaker's opinion, did the high... ...est honor to the memory of Sir Robert Peel ...(cheers)—and then to examine the mode ...in which the whole labour of the Commission ...had been frustrated by the domination

OF SELFISH INTERESTS.

(Parnellite cheers.) He did not deny the ...good intentions of the British Parliament to ...pass good laws for Ireland, but, he said, in ...order to work out the purposes of Govern... ...ment there is something more in this world ...occasionally required than the passing of ...good laws. (Hear, hear.) It is sometimes ...necessary, not only that good laws should be ...passed, but also that they should be passed

BY THE PROPER PERSONS.

The passing of many good laws is not enough ...in cases where the strong instincts of the ...people, distinct marks of character, situation, ...and history require, not only that these laws ...should be good, but that they should proced ...from congenial and native sources, and that ...besides being good laws, they should be

THEIR OWN LAWS.

(Irish cheers.) "At times I doubted whether ...this necessity had been fully developed, and ...especially with respect to Ireland. If doubts ...could be entertained before the last general ...election, they cannot now be entertained. ...The principle I have laid down, I am not ...laying down for Ireland exceptionally. It is ...the very principle upon which within my ...recollection, to the immense advantage of the ...country, Parliament has not only altered but

REVOLUTIONIZED OUR METHOD

...of government When I held office at the ...Colonial Office, fifty years ago, the Colonies ...were governed from Downing-street. The ...result was that Home Government was al... ...ways in conflict with countries which had ...legislative Assemblies. We had continual ...shocks with the Colonies then. But all that ...has been changed. The British Parliament ...tried to pass good laws for the Colonies, but ...the Colonies said, We don't want your good ...laws, we want our OWN GOOD LAWS.

...and Parliament at length admitted the re... ...asonableness of this principle. This prin... ...ciple has now come home to us from across ...the sea, and the House has now to consider ...whether it is applicable to the case of Ireland.

We now stand face to face with what is termed Irish nationality, venting itself in a demand for the general self-government in Irish, not in Imperial affairs." In conclusion, Mr Gladstone said:—"I hold that there is such a thing as local patriotism, which in itself is.

NOT BAD BUT GOOD.

(Cheers.) The Welshman is full of local patriotism. The Scotchman is ful of local partiotism. No! Scotch nationality is as strong as ever was, and if the need were to arise I believe it would be as ready to assert itself as it was in the days of Bannockburn. (Cheers.) If I

READ IRISH HISTORY ARIGHT, misfortune and calamity have wedded her sons to their soil with an embrace yet closer than is known elsewhere, and the Irishman is still more profoundly Irish, but it does not follow that because his local patriotism is strong he should be incapable of an Imperial patriotism. There are two modes of presenting the subject which I have rgued. One of them is the present what we now recommend as good, and the other is to present i tas a choice of evils and the least among the varied evils with which as a possibility we are confronted. Well, I have argued the matter as if it had been

A CHOICE OF EVILS.

I have recognized as facts and as entitled to attention jealousies which I myself do not share or feel. I have argued it on that ground as the only ground on which it can be recommended, not only to a mixed auditory, but to the public mind of the country that cannot give minute investigation to all portions of this complicated question. I do not know whether it may appear too bold, but in my own heart I cherish the hope that this is not merely a choice of the lesser evil, but that it may be proved to be ere long

A GOOD IN ITSELF.

(Loud cheers.) There is, I know, an answer to this, and what is the answer? The answer is only found in the view which rests upon a basis of despair, of absolute condemnation of Ireland and Irishmen as exceptions to those beneficial provisions which have made, in general Europeans, in particular Englishmen and Americans, capable of self-government; that an Irishman is a lusus nature; that justice, common sense, moderation,

NATURAL PROSPERITY

have no meaning for him; that all that he can understand and all that he can appreciate is strife, perpetual dissension. Now, Sir, I am not going to argue in this House whether this view, this monstrous view—(Irish cheers)—is a correct one I say the Irishman is as capable of loyalty as another man—(renewed Irish cheers)—but if his loyalty has been checked, why it is because the laws by which he is governed do not present themselves to him as they do to us in England or Scotland with a native and

CONGENIAL ELEMENT.

I have no right to say that Ireland through her constitutionally elected members will accept the measure I propose. I hope they will, but I have no right to assume it; nor have I any power to enforce it upon the people of England and Scotland, but I rely on the patriotism and the sagacity of this House; on a FREE AND FULL DISCUSSION,

and, more than all, upon the just and generous sentiments of the two British nations. And, looking forward, I ask the House, believing that no trivial motive could have driven us to assist in the work we have undertaken (work which we believe will restore Parliament to its free and unimpeded course)—I ask them to stay the

WASTE OF THE PUBLIC TREASURE

under the present system of government and administeration in Ireland, which is not waste only, but waste which demoralizes while it exhausts—I ask them to show to Europe and America that we, too, can face the political problems which America had to face twenty years ago, and which many countries in Europe have been called on to face, and have not feared to deal with. I ask that we shall practice as we have very often preached, and that in our own case we should in applying the doctrines we have often inculcated on others, that the concession of local self-government is not the way to sap and impair, but to strengthen and consolidate unity. I ask that we should learn to rely less on mear written stipulations and more on those better stipulations written on the heart and mind of man, I ask that we should apply to Ireland the happy experience we have gained in England and Scotland, where a course of generations has now taught us, not as a dream or a theory, but as a matter of practice and of life, that the best and surest foundation we can find to build on is the foundation afforded by the affections and convictions and will of man, and it is thus by the decree of the Almighty that, far more than by any other method, we may be enabled to secure at once the social happiness, the power, and the permanence of the Empire."

Mr. Gladstone finished his address at 8 o'clock, having spoken three hours and twenty-five minutes, and resumed his seat amid bursts of enthusiastic cheers, which were sustained for several minutes.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Afflictions, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Dability and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. THE FARM.

Stock Notes.

Hoven is the most likely to make its appearance the first two weeks the cattle are on grass. It is a distention of the rumen, caused by gas from undigested food. Young grass, particularly clover, is more apt to produce it than old grass; and wet pasturage is more dangerous than dry pasturage. Prevention is better than cure; and I write of it now because "forewarned is forearmed." Allow the cattle on the grass but one hour the first day. Gradually increase this time with a rate that will allow the cattle to eat their fill by the end of the week. Do not turn cattle upon the pasture until the dew is off, for at least two weeks; and if the pasture is mostly clover, not at all. It is never safe to turn cattle upon wet clover.

Though the precautions suggested above be taken, hoven may possibly appear; and it is probable that it will show itself in the herd if these precautions are not taken. If the disease is noticed in its first stages, give doses from two to four drachms of chloride of lime. Another remedy is to give a teaspoonful of pulverized charcoal every fifteen minutes, in a half pint of milk or water, sweetened with a little molasses. The dernier resort is to puncture the abdomen. The puncture is made about three inches below the spinal column, midway between the hips and the last rib, in the left flank. Get a competent veterinarian to perform this operation, if possible. He will use a trocar. A sharp pointed knife may be used, inserting a pipestem or a quill in the incision to allow the gas to escape.

Colic is most likely to attack horses in the spring, as then are most apt to exist the conditions which produce it—change from dry to green food, unusual fatigue, weak condition of digestive organs, getting wet, etc. The remedies suggest themselves—care in feeding, watering and working, and the administration of what medicines are necessary to put the digestive organs in good condition. The best remedy I know of—one which I have never known to fail—is turpentine rubbed against the upper jaw and inner side of the upper lip of the horse. Fill the palm of your right hand with the turpentine. Rub some on the breast also. Apply every twenty minutes until relief is given.

The mule is an animal of many virtues. He is much underated. He is the victim of a blind, unreasoning, colossal prejudice. The populace hold him in contempt, many fear him, and he has none to trust or love him. Yet he is patient, docile and tractable when decently treated. Cursed and clubbed, he is not so vicious as a horse would be, but as he is more often so treated, he has acquired a reputation less creditble. He will do more work than a horse, eat less, suffer less from heat, and from sickness. He is stubborn sometimes, but always ready for work. Will kick, but not oftener than a horse under the same treatment. The mule suffers, not from a fault, but from a misfortune—lack of beauty. Hence, he is not petted and borne with, but abused till he is soured, and becomes meau. The man who knows how a mule should be handled—as kindly as other animals—has a high opinion of him, and he justifies this opinion.

It will be set down as rank agricultural heresy to oppose the ringing of hogs. The majority of hogs now wear rings in their snouts; their owners are responsible for this, hence, must approve of it, and the manufacturers of rings are sure it is a great thing. Hogs should not be allowed to turn the turf of a pasture field upside down. But I have raised hogs largely for years, have never used a ring, and yet my pastures are not inverted. Perhaps I have a breed of non-rooting hogs. I have raised Poland-Chinas, Berkshires and Duroc-Jerseys. If they are non-rooters, it is because the way I feed them makes them so. I give them a variety of food—pumpkins, apples, roots, etc., along with their corn, and salt and charcoal regularly. As this pays in the greater thrift of the animals, I think it is better than rings. The Lord intended the hog to use his snout in moderation. Ringing is pernicious. It antagonizes health.

Honor To the Bare Hand.

As an ounce of rugged fact outweighs a much larger bulk of inflated theory, let us cite—apropos of the agricultural education discussion—an illustrative case of contraries coming within our own observation. The boys of one rural villager were taught to be useful from the time they could perform the simplest helpful service; were charged with humble duties not beyond their capacity, or to their physical detriment, or encroaching upon their time for study and play. Their responsibilities were gradually increased with their age until as young men the habit of industry had come to be to them a kind of second nature, and they entered at once the fair road to independence and good citizenship by slow and steady gains.

Another man's sons, every way more highly endowed, had easy times; learned early to shirk and loaf; came at last to lounging at the corner store. This tendency to indolence relaxed their mental and moral fibre, and though much more time and expense was involved in their schooling they grew up and "graduated" with desire for genteel situations, where work was not so much an object as high salary; and they have proved ineffective and a source of anxiety to parents and friends. This is a sample fact from a whole impressive structure standing across the dalliance path of the "patent leather despisers" of the "bare-hand education,' who drop dainty buckets into empty wells and grow old drawing nothing up.

The more culture we can have of the doing power, even at cost of ignorance of language long deceased and often odoriferous, the better for the prosperity of this country, where Labor is coming every day nearer to its own. There is among us, as earnest students of affairs recognize and lament, constant immolation of Honor in the reckless haste for sudden wealth. What is needed to stay the rush of mammon worship, otherwise sure to bring national disaster, is not more lawyers or more men in the "kid-glove professions," but those schooled to a knowledge of the dignity of honest manual labor directed by minds enlarged by practical education.

The schools which are to hasten this reform are not the fashionable "universities," nor those which ape their methods; where the necessities are sacrificed to the graces. Through these rich men's sons are passed with green house pressure, largely for show, and contact with them and their athletic and their æsthetic ways, enervates the native virtue of country youth which needs rather to be fostered from strength to strength.

El Mahdi's War Doubles Prices.

"The recent troubles in Africa," said a dealer in wild animals, "have made all African animals expensive; but so many Indian animals have been shipped to all parts of the world that they can be bought very cheap. You can now get a fine Bengal tiger, that would have cost you from $2,000 to $3,000 not long ago, for $1,600 or $1,800."

"What sort of animals command the highest prices?" questioned the reporter.

"Well, you know that there is a great deal of fraud in the show business as well as in other professions and other lines of trade. On general principles a showman will pay the highest rates for any animal he can advertise for any especial peculiarity or quality. The most glaring instance I can remember is the price paid for Jumbo. We had here a couple of Malay elephants that came from a mountainous country, and which by a provision of nature were covered with hair four or five inches long to keep out the cold. There was nothing very extraordinary about that, perhaps; but those animals were widely advertised as 'wooly,' and we had no difficulty in disposing of them for $10,000 each, though they were as poor, small specimens as I ever saw. One was only thirty-two inches high."

"Which animals sell the best?"

"The most expensive probably are the hippopotami. There are none to be had in the market at the present time. If we had one we could readily get $7,000 to $8,000 for it. A rhinoceros will command from $3,000 to $5,000, and is hard to get. Elephants are now a glut on the market, and are consequently selling cheap. Those we used to get $6,000 for we now sell for $2,000."

"How do the felines sell?"

"Well, here's a lion, in good condition, we have marked at $1,000. Lions are caught when about five or six months old by our agents in Africa, and kept for about a year when they are fully grown. It is almost impossible to catch them when they are old. Tigers bring the same prices, a first-class one running up nearly $2,000. I have a magnificent pair of black leopards over there," pointing to a cage in which two huge creatures were growling. "They are the crossest brutes I've ever seen, though we've had them some time. They're worth $500 each. Here's a nice little pair of spotted leopards," putting his hand through and caressing one of them, "that are worth $500 for the two, because they are particularly good for a circus, being quite tame and consequently available for exhibition by a beast tamer or for a parade."

"Do any other animals bring good prices?"

"Oh, yes. A chimpanzee brings $500. If we had a dozen giraffes to-day we could sell them for $2,000 apiece. A good baboon is worth $250. Little monkeys sell from $15 upward. There are few African antelopes now in the market, but they always bring good prices.

A Hazardous Occupation.

Some time ago the statement was published, upon apparently good authority, that in the course of five years' service about 70 per cent. of train hands upon our railways are injured. This statement has never been denied.

The average life of a freight brakeman is about ten years. If the number of accidents be taken into consideration, and the expense entailed upon the companies for damages paid in the case of such accidents be estimated, it will be seen what a burden is carried by the roads on account of the defective appliances now used on freight trains.

Most of the accidents and nearly all the loss of life caused by them is because the freight engineer has no control over his train. The methods of stopping them are antiquated and imperfect.

Under these circumstances does it not seem strange that on all railways the most modern appliances for stopping freight trains and locomotives are not used? There are diver brakes for freight locomotives and automatic brakes for freight cars which do all that is claimed for them.

This being the case, why are not these new appliances generally adopted?

Shocking Bad Taste.

"My dear, don't you intend to invite Mr. and Mrs. Green to your party?" asked Mr. Biller.

"Certainly not."

"Why not, my dear? They are good friends of ours."

"What if they are? I am going to invite Mr. and Mrs. Brown."

"Well, can't you invite the Greens, as well?"

"Why, John Biller, you shock me with your taste! Brown and Green in my parlors together! Why, next you'll be asking me to wear blue and yellow! I declare, you men have no idea whatever of harmony!"

The American Bison.

Twenty years ago the chief feature of the plains beyond the Missouri was the countless herds of buffalo everywhere to be seen. Now all have disappeared. Theodore Roosevelt says there are not 1 000 buffalos in America. It is said one may travel 1,000 miles on the plains and never be out of sight of a dead buffalo nor within sight of a live one. But a newspaper has the curious statement that a new species of buffalo is developing in the woody precipitous regions of the mountain ranges; it shuns the open plains, lives in small herds, is endowed with great activity, and is a clear case of the "survival of the fittest."

How It Grows.

"Oh, Fanny, you'd never believe it!"

"Yes I would, and I'm dying to hear."

"You know Milly Bilfiggin? I heard from Celia Rouger that she was engaged."

"Is that all? I thought you were going to tell me that she had eloped."

"Well, dear, you can make it an elopement when you tell the story."

PAUL BENT'S VICTORY.

Illustrating that "Truth is Stranger than Fiction."

One morning a new sign hung on the door of an office in the most unfrequented part of the city of T——. It was small and unpretentious, and bore but three words in gilt letters: "Paul Bent, Lawyer." People read it carelessly and passed on; some wondered who this young man could be, for they judged he must be young, but no one recognized the name for some days.

Blanche May was passing along the street one morning when the new sign met her eyes. She read it the second time, while the blood fled from her face. Then she glanced at the window and saw a gentleman gazing at her. He was nicely dressed, the hue of health overspread his countenance, and he looked every inch a man. She only looked an instant, then let her eyes drop and passed on, sad or happy it is needless for me to say.

Paul Bent was talented; business poured in upon him and success crowned all his efforts. His name became celebrated throughout the city, and when it was known that he would speak, the court-room was crowded, for he was a natural orator.

A year soon passed away, and on a pleasant afternoon in May, while Blanche was walking in one of those shaded squares so numerous in our large cities she saw Paul enter at one of the gates. He walked leisurely along with his eyes bent on the ground, and seated himself on a bench. She watched him closely, but he never looked up; he seemed to be deeply meditating. Then she seated herself quietly by his side, and touched his arm. He looked around, and seeing her a happy smile broke over his countenance, and he exclaimed:

"Blanche!"

She held out her hand, but he hesitated to take it.

"Paul," she said, "will you not take the hand of an old friend?"

"I am not worthy, Blanche," he said, sorrowfully.

"Paul, I know all. I have heard about your terrible battles with your temptation, and I honor you. Before I pitied you, now I honor you as a hero. I glory in the success which is crowning your effort, and my heart is happy, for in you I see to-day the answer from God to my prayers. Won't you take my hand now, Paul?" she asked, with a winning smile.

He reverently raised her hand to his lips, then let it drop and turned away; but she caught him by the sleeve, and in an imploring voice said:

"Paul, don't leave thus! Do you know why I prayed for you? It was because I always loved you—and that love is not dead yet!"

She blushed as she made the avowal, but she had hardly finished before he caught her to his breast. Then they seated themselves again, and talked till long after the sun had gone down. Paul told his whole story, how one night, after months of hard drinking, he had given up all hope of reforming or of becoming worthy of the love of Blanche, who had been betrothed to him in better days. His friends had all long since deserted him, his money was wasted, and every article he possessed of any value had been pawned. He steadied himself against the side of a saloon-keeper's door, from which he had been rudely expelled, and looked around him. Far up and down he could see the dark street stretching like an immense serpent. At last a policeman bade him "move on." He walked slowly away. He was without ambition; his only desire was for rum or death. He walked toward the river, reached the bridge, walked far out on it, then stopped and looked down into the water.

He cast his eyes toward the city, but not a living object was to be seen. The streets were tenantless, and the houses frowned on them as darkly as ever. But one window was lighted; all the rest were dark, and the city seemed to have laid down to rest and was silent as the river.

He took off his hat and laid it down, removed his coat, seized the top rail, and, placing his foot on the lower one, began to ascend.

Suddenly the stillness was broken by a low sound. He paused in alarm and looked around him. A low, soft note, sweet as the voice of an angel, sounded across the water. He paused as though he had heard a Divine command, and half sitting on the top rail, listened. The first note was followed by others as ravishing, and then a voice that sounded strangely familiar broke forth in tones of sweetest melody.

The voice was low and melancholy at first, and some of the words were indistinct, but as she proceeded—for he could tell it was a woman's voice—it gathered volume and the sentences rolled over the water distinct and grand. He was entranced. A strange trembling seized him, and, without knowing why, he got down off the railing and quietly stood there, drinking in every word and note of that magnificent verse, so descriptive of his situation.

Old memories crowded fast upon him; he seemed again to hear the voice of his promised wife as she said:

"Paul, my father fills a drunkard's grave. I cannot trust my happiness to one who may follow in his path. I love you, Paul. Prove yourself a man, and in three years come to to me; I will be waiting for you."

A few low notes and the music ceased, and all was still again, but the silence found Paul Bent greatly changed. Deep sobs were shaking his frame and his knees were bent in prayer, for a soul and life had been saved.

He rose after a while, and picking up his old coat and hat passed over the bridge and through the town out into the country. and soon his name was forgotten by all but a few in that great city. Five years later he returned a new man.

When he had finished his story Blanche asked:

"Did you ever find out the name of the singer?"

"No," he replied. "I hope to some day, for I wish to thank her."

"You need not wait long," she said, "You can do so now. It was I who sang the song."

Father-in-law—Perhaps, sir, you think I'm going to support you for the rest of your natural life. Son-in-law—Well, I don't know why you shouldn't. I took your daughter off your hands.

It turns out that Mr. Edgar Fawcett is the author of the anonymous story published in Philadelphia some time ago under the title of "The Buntling Ball." The publishers offered a prize of $1,000 to anybody guessing the author. So many people suspected Fawcett, owing to the turgid style, that the purse has been divided up and the guessers will only realize 12½ cents apiece.

Belva Lockwood, of course, has taken a hand in the low-neck discussion, and seeks to create additional bustle by adding the trained skirt to the tabooed articles. She has written a letter to Miss Cleveland, in which she declares that "while the trained skirt is untidy, extravagant and in crowded assemblies positively vulgar, it is also undoubtedly in its origin a badge of servility."

With Sir Henry Taylor, who died in England March 23, in his eighty-seventh year, a living epitome of the nineteenth century has passed away. He had seen the reigns of the Third and Fourth Georges and William IV., as well as the whole of Victoria's; also the rise and fall of the first Napoleon, his Bourbon successors, and the Third Empire; Scott, Byron, and Shelley, Lamb, Coleridge, and the Lake Poets, together with Dickens and Thackeray, Irving and Prescott, were of his era; he was a well-grown lad at the time of our almost forgotten war of 1812, and had witnessed a complete reconstruction of the political map of Europe.

Mary Anderson is computed to be worth $500,000, which is said to be safely invested in real estate, gas stocks and railway shares, both in England and America. A small portion of it is in American bonds. She expects to clear this year $150,000. But our Mary is not so rich as her sister professional, Lotta, who, as a rule, lives frugally, and is eminently businesslike. She claims to be, and probably is, the wealthiest woman on the stage. Her dollars are estimated as totalling up to considerably more than a clear million. Most of the money is held in the name of her mother, Mrs. Crabtree, who has been her daughter's business manager ever since she appeared on the stage. Lotta has sustained only one serious monetary loss. A man she was engaged to was at the bottom of it. She let him have $20,000 to speculate with. He lost the whole of it, and Lotta's heart and hand at the same time.

Almost every visitor in Paris who has ridden out toward the Bois has seen the old man in the little carriage drawn by sheep pottering along in the avenue du Bois de Boulouge. These sheep are two fine fat South Downs, but the occupant is a cripple named Dr. De Reroy. He has been by turns a soldier, a traveller, a politician, a journalist and a man of letters. A nephew of the Abbe Lammenais, he was for a while private secretary of Lamartine, also an intimate friend of the Marquis of Hartford, at whose place in the Bois he frequently met Prince Napoleon. During the war he volunteered to carry important despatches out of Paris for the government of the Defense Nationale. He started alone in a balloon, which was caught in a hurricane, carried into Switzerland, and came down in the midst of the Mer de Glace glacier, where his legs were so frost bitten that they had to be amputated. Besides his legs, he lost his fortune by the war.

HEALTH.

What is Paralysis.

How many persons die from what is called a paralytic stroke, or apoplexy almost interminably, that not a little fear has been awakened, and much inquiry is made for an explanation of the causes of what appears to be a most deadly disease. Using the language of an intelligent observer we shall endeavor to give some points that are of practical value.

A carpenter or other mechanic, whose business requires him to wield a hammer, finds some morning that he is unable to raise his hammer arm, or perhaps while at work the man suddenly feels his arm become numb and weak; it falls to his side, and he is no longer able to work. The physician to whom the man applies says it is a brachial monoplegia from muscle tire," which means simply that the man has overwrought his hammer arm and it needs rest. In these cases the very appropriate name of "artisans' palsy" is given. Again, a poorly-developed, nervously constructed person, most often a woman, meets with a great shock or is forced to endure an unusual mental or physical effort, and perhaps without warning loses the use of some part of the body, often of the vocal apparatus, and is unable to speak above a whisper. The doctor calls it "hysterical paralysis," or "hysterical aphonia," loss of voice. Now just how this comes about, we fancy it would puzzle the most learned specialist to say. Concerning this condition, however, a well as the one before mentioned, this much is known, viz., that by appropriate treatment they recover, which is very good evidence that no part of the nervous apparatus is broken. The quick cures reported from time to time are probably, for the most part, cases of this kind.

It sometimes happens that an intoxicated person will fall asleep with the head resting upon the arm or with the arm hanging over a chair back. When he wakes the arm is numb and is paralyzed—another case of brachial monoplegia.

Pressure upon the trunks of the nerves which supply the disabled member has affected those nerves so hat they are unable to perform their usual duty. The nerves which go out from the brain spinal cord to the extremities are quite comparable to the wires which are stretched from place to place for electric communications, and pressure upon the one secton of those nerves produces results very like those which follow an interference with the electric wire. The case jus given illustrates very well a large number of cases of palsy from pressure, from pressure upon the brain or spinal cord, or the nerves which have their exit therefrom, will produce a palsy whose extent wil depend upon the extent of the pressure, and whose duration will depend upon the chances for removing the pressure. Pressure upon the nerves which supply one side of the face produces a very characteristic paralysis and one that causes very many laughable mstakes on the part of tyros and non-professional people by their attempt to detect the affected side. Pressure upon the brain or spinal cord may be due to the presence of tumors, to fractures of the skull, or to the upper bones of which the backbone is formed, and to blood clots within the skull or spinal canal. Patients who recover from diphtheria, scarlet fever, and some other acute sickness, are frequently paralyzed in some part. These cases generally recover by proper treatment, and it is quite probable that many cases would recover spontaneously if let alone.

People who work in lead are liable to a peculiar form of paralysis, which is first seen, as a rule, in the muscles of the forearm, on account of which the patient is unable to extend the hand upon the arm. At times the whole muscular system is involved. Change of occupation and the use of remedies which will assist the elimination of the mineral from the system is the proper course for such patients. Analogous forms of paralysis are caused by arsenic and quicksilver, probably by their action upon the nerve structure of the spinal cord. Woorara, the Indian arrow-poison, will also produce paralysis if introduced into the system in sufficient quantities. The paralyzing effect of large doses of alcohol are well known.

Certain conditions of the circulatory apparatus predispose to extensive and often incurable paralysis. Here it is that most cases of apoplexy occur. The arteries are elastic tubes. By age, hard work, care and the prolonged use of alcoholic drinks, these tubes lose their elasticity and become brittle. By some event which excites the flow of an unusual quantity of blood to the brain one of these now inelastic tubes is broken, the poured-out blood settles in the ventricles and there form clots whose presence causes speedy paralysis.

Owing to certain systematic conditions fibrine, a substance normally suspended in the blood, sometimes ledges upon the floodgates or valves of the heart. Presently a part of this matter is dislodged and washed away into the blood; perchance it reaches an artery in the brain which will not permit it to pass. Then we have an "embolism" which cuts off the blood supply from a part of the brain, one of the immdiate symptoms of which is palsy of the part of the body which receives its nerve supply from that portion of the brain. These paralyses are usually extensive, and are not readily distinguishable from those just mentioned.

Finally, change in the structure of the brain or spinal cord produce paralysis, more or less localized varying in extent with the extent of nerve structure involved. Such paralysis are especially obstinate in those of advanced years, and usually produce disability in the legs.

The study of this subject has led to the determination of certain brain centres as possessing special muscular control, so that many kinds of paralysis can be traced to disease or loss of function in definite parts of the encephalon.

Safe, Sure, and Painless.

What a world of meaning this statement embodies. Just what you are looking for, is it not? Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor—the great sure-pop corn cure—acts in this way. It makes no sore spots; safe, acts speedily and with certainty; sure and mildly, without inflaming the parts; painlessly. Do not be imposed upon by imitations or substitutes.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

"I should like to spoke a few words to Brudder Amazon Green," said the President as the meeting opened and the Hall grew quiet.

Brother Green, who is a young man with a mallow look and a hitch in his gait, advanced to the platform in a hesitating manner and the President continued:

"Brudder Green, I l'arn dat you am on de pint of gwine inter bizness fer yerself. I am told dat you am soon to open a oo'ner grocery an' a butcher shop combined."

"Yes, sah."

"I'ze glad dat you am about to make a start in life, and I desiah to drop a few hints which may be of seme value to you. Brudder Green, de grocer who gives fifteen ounces to de pound may wax fat fur a few years an' git to be referee at a wrestlin' match, but Justice has her eye on him, and when the ole gal gits around to it she'll gin him a dose dat will set him back fer twenty years.

"De pusson who sells fifty-cent tea an' two-shillin' tea from de same chist may git along powerful smart fur a while, but he's only coaxin' a bile to grew on his nose. When de bile comes he'll pay out more for flaxseed dan he has made on tea.

"In sellin' beefsteak study human natur'. Some men doan' object to a pound and a half of bone to half a pound of meat, but we ain't all built arter dat fashun. Doan' kill a hundred dollars worf of custom for de sake of sellin' fo' cents worf of bone.

"While it am expected dat you will hide de bad taters in de middle of de measure, doan' misunderstan' de public an' water yer 'lasses as well.

"If a man axes you fer lamb an' you hasn't got nuffin but ole sheep, tell him so. Deceivin' a man on mutton makes him as much your enemy as if you beat him out o' a congreshunal nominashun.

"De paper which you buy fur two cents a pound kin be weighed up wid goods dat sell fur fifteen and nobody will kick, but doan' emagine dat dis gives you license to roast beans wid your coffee or keep fillin' up de vinegar bar'l wid rain-water.

"Be keerful whom you credit. Dar am plenty of people in dis world who like to pay debts, but dar am about de same number who will jump you fur some other stosh as soon as de books balance fo'teen cents agin 'em.

"Doan' cease gwine to church bekase you am in business, but next time de pew-rentin' comes off take a seat a leedle furder back. Lots of people hev somehow got de ideah dat a modern bizness man, doin' bizness arter de modern fashun, has got to do a heap o' wrestlin' wid his conscience in case he adopts any pertickler brand o' religun.

"De public will expect you to make some mistakes in addishun, but be a leetle keerful about it. Make 'em in favor of de public about half de time."

FAILED TO PASS.

Judge Chewso offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, Dat it am de sense of dis Lime-Kiln Club dat de present Congriss should pass a law makin it a penal offense fur any pusson to place a torpedo chicken in his coop. De reason we want dis law am to purteck de nateral chicken from bein' subjeck to exploshun."

Lord Timberly Johnson favored the resolution. The torpedo chicken was invented to surprise the person who gained access to a hen-coop and undertook to pull a pullet off her roost, but time had demonstrated that the torpedo was liable to explode at any other time and bring destruction upon innocent fowls.

Sir Wallace Smith also favered the resolution. He was the friend of the hen under all circumstances, and he would ever raise his voice to ameliorate her down-trodden condition.

The Rev. Penstock opposed the resolution and demanded a call of the roll. Certain people were always seeking to connect colored people and chickens together, but why he could not see. If the torpedo chicken was invented to protect chickens from thieves why need the colored man be afraid? Why need any colored man seek to work up sympathy for the hen? Judge Chewso might prefer hen-beef to other meats, but let him eat it in silence and not seek to drag this club before the public in a false light.

The Secretary then called the roll, and the Judge's resolution was voted down by a majority of 47.

NOT ONE.

A communication from St. Louis made inquiry if any member of the Lime-Kiln Club would be attached to any base ball club, circus, theatrical company or dime museum this coming season. If none had been engaged were any members open to engagement?

Seventeen members arose in chorus, and seventeen voices were seeking to get the pitch, when the President's gavel came down and he asked:

"Why dis sudden emoshun? Am dar a fish in de grocery below?"

"What's de salary?" asked Colonel Juneberry Crowstree in an anxious voice.

"Salary fur what?"

"Fur trabblin' around de kentry."

"Brudder Crowstree, sot down! I'ze happy to inform de public dat no member of dis club am engaged up to de present moment. Furder dan dat, none am open to engagement. We's all gwine to stay right heah an' attend to our co'n an' taters. Does any pusson in dis Hall desiah to appeal from de decishun of dis chair?"

He looked up and down the aisles. There was dead silence. Nobody desired to appeal.

NOT A DEFAULTER.

Sir Issac Walpole, of the committee on Internal Investigation, desired to report on the case of Alabaster Jordar, Assistant Treasurer. Some four weeks since Brother Jordan found his cash short by fifteen cents, or, rather the Investigating Committee did, and he was suspended pending an examination. Four days since, in changing his socks, the heart-broken man found the missing money in his left heel, where it had slipped down from a hole in his pocket. He had felt the hard substances there right along, but supposed, of course, they were two new corns of revised pattern. The money had been handed in, his accounts balanced, and it pleased Sir Isaac to be able to inform the club that Brother Jordan stood before them as innocent as a spring lamb.

On motion of Pickles Smith, the club adopted a resolution to the effect that it had not lost any confidence in the assistant treasurer.

THE CODE.

Prof Burwell Cavendish, a late local member, made his debut by inquiring if the club officially upheld the code. If he was insulted, and he challenged the insulter, would the club stand by him?

"What would you challenge him to do?" asked the President.

"To meet me on de field of honah, sah."

"What fur?"

"To fight, sah."

"Oh, I see. Well, Brudder Cavendish, my advice to you am to keep off de field of honah. You'll git yer feet all wet, ta'r yer coat-tails on de bushes, and probably be run off by de farmer's brindled dog. When a man sasses me, an' does it to be mean, I'ze gwine to let drive fur his nose wid my bunch of fives. Dat's code 'nuff fur anybody, an' you kin hit him on de sidewalk as well as to go off to some field of honah. Let us now adjourn fur one week."

Dangers in Africa.

"The most dangerous savage foes we have to fear," says Mr. Stanley, "are the crocodile, hippopotamus and the buffalo. We lost five men during my last visit to the Congo from these animals; three were killed by crocodiles, one by a hippopotamus and one by a buffalo. There are a large number of hippopotami along the Congo and its tributaries, and thousands upon thousands of crocodiles. The latter are by far the most insidious foes we have, because they are so silent and so swift. You see a man bathing in the river," said Mr. Stanley, with one of his vivid graphic touches; "he is standing near the shore laughing at you, perhaps, laughing in the keen enjoyment of his bath; suddenly he falls over and you see him no more. A crocodile has approached unseen, has struck him a blow with its tail that knocks him over, and he is instantly seized and carried off. Or, it may be that the man is swimming; he is totally unconscious of danger; there is nothing in sight, nothing to stir a tremor of apprehension; but there, in deep water, under the shadow of that rock, or hidden beneath the shelter of the trees yonder, is a huge crocodile; it has spotted the swimmer, and is watching the opportunity; the swimmer approaches; he is within striking distance; stealthily, silently, unperceived, the creature makes for its prey; the man knows nothing till he is seized by the leg and dragged under, and he knows no more! A bubble or two indicates the place where he has gone down, and that is all."

Essay on "Columbus."

The following story comes from a school in the Midlands. The master told the boys of the third class to write a short essay upon Columbus. The following was sent up by an ambitious essayist: "Clumbus was a man who could make an egg stand on end without breaking it. The King of Spain said to Clumbus, 'Can you discover America? 'Yes,' said Clumbus, 'if you will give me a ship.' So he had a ship, and sailed over the sea in the direction where he thought America ought to be found. The sailors quarrelled, and they said they believed there was no such place. But after many days the pilot came to him and said, 'Clumbus,' I see land.' 'Then that is America,' said Clumbus. When the ship got near the land was full of black men. Clumbus said, 'Is this America?' 'Yes it is,' said they. Then he said, 'I suppose you are the Niggers?' 'Yes,' they said; 'we are.' The chief said, 'I suppose you are Clumbus?' 'You are right,' said he. Then the chief turned to his men and said, 'There is no help for it; we are discovered at last.'"

Married Life.

I think it is as much the husband's duty to make home what it ought to be as the wife's. Are not their shoulders as broad as ours? We all have our duty to perform. I think sometimes if husbands thought more about making their homes happy, instead of the wives having it all to do, some would be different from what they are now. Woman's work sometimes is the same week in and week out; then is it to be wondered at that she does not always have a smile on her face, when she stays at home month after month? Why dosen't her husband say, I must go up town, and it will do you good to get out; we will all go and take a sleigh ride? I imagine he says to himself it will take fifteen or twenty minutes to get the horse and wagon ready, and it is so much trouble to take my wife and children, they are used to staying at home, and it's not necessary for them to go, I'll go afoot.

An Expert.

Mrs. Fizzletop overheard her son Johnny swear like a trooper.

"Why, Johnny," she exclaimed, "who taught you to swear that way?"

"Taught me to swear," exclaimed Johnny, "why it's me who teaches the other boys."

Not As I Will.

Blindfolded and alone I stand
With unknown thresholds on each hand;
The darkness deepens as I grope,
Afraid to fear, afraid to hope;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely as I go,
That doors are opened, ways are made,
Burdens are lifted or are laid,
By some great law unseen and still Unfathomed purpose to fulfil,
"Not as I will."

Blindfolded and alone I wait,
Loss seems too bitter, gain too late;
Too heavy burdens in the load,
And too few helpers on the road;
And joy is weak and grief is strong,
And years and days so long, so long;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely as I go,
That I am glad the good and ill
By changeless law are ordered still
"Not as I will."

"Not as I will!" the sound grows sweet
Each time my lips the words repeat.
"Not as I will," the darkness feels
More safe than light when this thought steals
Like whispered voice to calm and bless
All unrest and all loneliness.
"Not as I will" because the One
Who loved us first and best has gone
Before us on the road, and still
For us must all His love fulfill—
"Not as I will."

AT the Easter Vestry meeting held in Christ Church, Markdale, on Monday evening, the following named officers were elected:—Church Wardens, B. Coleman and S. Douglass; Sidesmen, Sol. Hill, A. Turner, Thos. Elliott and O. Walker; Lay Delegate to Synod, A. Turner; Vestry Clerk—R. D. Bigger; Auditors, J. W. Ford and J. Cæsar.

CLEANING UP.—It is right and proper to thoroughly clean up all yards; but it is a most reprehensible act to dump the filth thus scraped up, in wagon loads on our leading street, as some of our citizens have done this week. This filthy rubbish should be burned, and not left to breed disease and stifle other citizens who live adjacent, or those who pass to and from the station so frequently.

OUR railway station yard is in a very bad condition, the mud being about a foot deep on an average. This could easily be remedied by scraping off the surface, which is rotten bark and chips, and put down a layer of small field stone—which could be got conveniently, and covering it with gravel. There is a large business done both in freight and passenger traffic here, and we trust the company will make the necessary improvements.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Afflictions, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. NOYES, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, N.

BUILDING operations will be brisk in Markdale this season.

CHANGE IN BUSINESS.—Thomas Mathews has sold his livery business, together with brick dwelling and shop, stables, horses, carriages, &c., &c., to a Mr. Wm. Taylor of Sarnia, for $3,000 cash, giving possession on Monday last. Mr. Mathews has been very successful in the business for many years, but wishes to concentrate his attention more fully to the harness manufacturing, which he has also conducted with credit to himself and satisfaction to the public for the past 20 years. Mr. Taylor is a young man of energy, and is already making improvements in adding to the already large equipment of vehicles. We wish him every success.

MISS BOWES, organizer of the Provincial Woman's Christain Temperance Union, has been very successful in her recent tour. She is an able and fluent public speaker, taking a practical commonsense view of the temperance question—or rather, the alcoholic drink traffic—presenting to her numerous and attentive hearers facts and statistics at once interesting and surprising. The great majority of temperance workers are extremists, thereby destroying the influence they would otherwise have; but Miss Bowes provokes interest, gives confidence and leaves a lasting impression for good, which has secured the universal sympathy and good will of the public and eulogy of the press wherever she has lectured.

A TRAGEDY!—A circumstance which looked extremely suspicious occurred on Tuesday morning. The atmosphere being cool and damp, our boy, as usual, started a fire in the stove, which, however, soon filled the room with smoke. The doors were thrown open, the pipes examined dampers opened, but all in vain, the inmates were all in tears; the boss could stand it no longer, and promptly quenched the fire by a liberal supply of water, when an examination was made as to the real cause, as the draft had always been excellent up to this occasion. The pipe was drawn from the chimney when we were horrified; What can it be? an infant rolled in a shawl? a burglar who had attempted to rob the office, or what. We succeeded, however, after strenous efforts, to drag the crisped, blackened and deformed remains of an old pair of pantloons from the chimney. How did it come there? thats what we want to know; perhaps our tenant in the next flat had been cleaning the upper portion of the chimney and fell in, loosing his pants, or else used an old pair for a sweep, and dropped them through, stopping where we found them. It is needless to say that the draft is wonderfully improved since.

HEALTH.

Cautions for the Aged.

Age works great physical changes, many of which are generally recognized. Some of them involve dangerous liabilities, and impose the need of constant caution.

One is to guard against undue exertion. The tough, elastic coat of the arteries is apt to become, on the one hand, chalk-like and brittle, or, on the other hand, fatty and weak. Nature seeks to guard against the consequent danger by rendering older persons less inclined to effort. But a little extra exertion put forth suddenly, may cause the weakened vessels to give way, from the increased force with which the heart throws the blood into them. Hence may result apoplexy or fatal aneurism—the latter being a sudden bulging out of arteries.

So, too, the heart itself (or its aorta—the great curved trunk which first receives the blood from the heart) may be in a similar condition, and suddenly fail because of undue exertion, when it might have been equal to the ordinary work of years. Such no doubt was the last case, when an elderly gentleman hurried to reach a railroad train, and fell dead on entering it. The aged should firmly refuse to hurry.

A like caution applies to whatever quickens the action of the heart. Every one knows the power of violent emotions in this respect. No one wishes to fall dead in a fit of anger. Undue eating, especially of stimulating food, is almost as dangerous. All the appetites need to be kept under control.

A special caution is needed in descending the stairs. In our normal voluntary movements there are certain nice adjustments affected by unconscious mental acts. But age effects such a change in the brain substance that mental activity is lessened. An old man can no more think as quickly as a young than he can run as fast, or jump as high. Hence the missteps of the aged in descending stairs. Aged persons, therefore, should form the habit of taking their bearing, so to speak, at the top of the stairs, and keep their mind on each step down by a conscious voluntary effort.

The aged should also most carefully guard against a chill. It is more dangerous for an old man to catch cold than for a young man to catch a fever.

Pack the Lungs with Air.

Deep breathing and holding of the breath is an item of importance. Persons of weak vitality find an uninterrupted succession of deep and rapid aspiration so distressing that they are discouraged from perserving in the exercise. Let such persons take into the lungs as much air as they can at a breath and hold it as long as they can, and they will find a grateful sense of relief in the whole abdomnial region. Practice will increase ability to hold the breath and the capacity of the lungs. After a time the art may be learned of packing the lungs. This is done by taking and nolding the long breath and then forcing more air down the treachæ by swallows or air. The operation may be described by that of a fishe s mouth in water. To those who have never learned it will be surprising to what extent the lungs may be packed. Caution at first is needful but after practice will warrant large use of the treatment. The whole thoracic and abdominal cavities will receive immediate benefit and continuance and temperance in eating, good air and right exercise, will bring welcome improvement.

Palatable and Pure.

Distilled water is not essential to good health. It is "flat, stale and unprofitable." Unless well erated it is unpalatable. The process of distilling separates the mineral matter, but not the volatile substance. The com pounds of nitrogen and sulphur may reappear in the distilled water, and the peculiar odor so repulsive to delicate tastes. If clean soil-water cannot be obtained, make a large, deep and clean cistern, and keep it clean. Take a sound oak or ash barrel, put a false bottom (perforated) 3 inches from the bottom of the barrel; place three inches of clean washed gravel on the top of the perforated bottom; on this twelve inches of granulated charcoal, made from hard maple; on this 4 inches of clean washed sand, and then place a perforated false top over the sand, so that water poured into the barrel will not disturb the filtering materials beneath. Insert a wooden faucet in the side of the barrel, close to the bottom, and you will have a filter which will make good rainwater filtered through it as clean and palatable as can be desired.

Eating Lemons.

A good deal has been said through the papers about the healthfulness of lemons. The latest advice is how to use them so that they will do the most good, as follows: Most people know the benefit of lemonade before breakfast, but few know that it is more than doubled by taking another at night also. The way to get the better of the bilious system without the blue pill or quinine is to take the juice of one, two, or three lemons, as appetite craves, in as much ice-water as makes it pleasant to drink without sugar, before going to bed. In the morning, on rising, at least a half-hour before breakfast, take the juice of one lemon in a goblet of water. This will clear the system of humor and bile with efficiency, without the weakening effects of calomel or congress water. People should not irritate the stomach by eating lemons clear.

Bad Effect of Pickles.

The influence of acid in retarding or arresting salivary digestion is further of importance in the dietectic use of pickles, vinegar, salads and acid fruits. In the case of vinegar it was found that one part in 5000 sensibly retarded this process, a proportion of one in 1,000 rendered very slow, and one in 500 arrested it completely; so that when acid salads are taken together with bread the effect of the acid is to prevent any salivary digestion of the bread, a matter of little moment to a person with a vigorous digestion, but to a feeble dyspeptic one of some importance. There is a very widespread belief that drinking vinegar is an efficacious means of avoiding getting fat, and this popular belief would appear from these experimental observations to be well founded. If the vinegar be taken at the same time as farinaceous food it will greatly interfere with its digestion and assimilation.

HERE AND THERE.

Esther Dow, of Deerfield, N. H., who recently died, aged 88 years, had never in her life seen a railway train, and for years had not been off her farm.

Daniel Arnold, of Macon, Ga., hid his savings ($700) in a hole near his house, but the recent flood inundated the hole and carried away Dan's wealth.

A remarkable bedstead, made to order by a Milwaukee furniture firm, is 24 feet wide and has nine compartments, each intended to hold one of the purchaser's children.

One of the barbers who was arrested in Washington the other day for keeping his shop open on Sunday had employed a part of the day of rest in shaving President Cleveland.

Mr. Elijah Lane, of Keene, weighing 210 pounds and standing six feet eight inches high, is the tallest man in New Hempshire, and describes himself as "one of the lanes that has no turn."

An English dean, at the close of a sermon in which he warned his hearers of the speedy end of all things, asked for a liberal contribution to rebuild the tower of the church in which he was preaching.

Phillips Brooks, of Boston, when rector of a church in Philadelphia some years ago, received so many pairs of slippers from his devoted young lady parishioners that he was popularly called the clerical centipede.

Sam Small has given $140 for the benefit of an Atlanta, Ga., mission Sunday-school. He writes:—"I hope it will do away with the necessity of an entertainment, for I do not believe these means of getting money for the Lord's work, are to either His honour or glory. Try to avoid all such schemes. Let people give what they will, but please don't barter them anything for the Lord's sake."

A Texas jeweller hung a watch in his window and labelled it: "Look at this watch for $10," and the unsophisticated gentleman from a neighboring county who stared at the article and then went in and wanted the $10 had to get down on the floor with the jeweller and roll over and under him a number of times before he could be made to understand that he couldn't have any $10.

Thunder from a clear sky could hardly have more surprised the passengers in a street car recently than the sudden exclamation made by a 3-year-old child, of remarkably beautiful face and form. It had been lying half asleep in its mother's arms, and had been awakened, when it straightened up and cried, loud enough to be heard from one end of the car to the other, "Ma, if you don't let me alone I'll break your nose."

Sealing-wax was quite the rage with fashionable letter-writers six months and even three months ago, but ultra-fashionable women use it no longer. The rage for decorating the backs of envelopes with huge blots of red, blue, black, or green wax, in which was impressed a monogram or initial, spread among women generally. So fashion has now tabooed it and has returned to the habit of using ready-gummed envelopes.

An Alabama newspaper seriously tells its readers that 4-year-old Dillie Welsh and a small Jersey calf are great friends. One day Dillie went to an unused well and peeped over the low curb. The calf saw her, and seized her dress in its mouth. The little girl lost her balance and fell over the curb, but the calf hung on, and for half an hour held her thus suspended until the child was rescued. Then the calf was very happy.

A Maine fisherman, who used to sail the Southern seas, reports that he saw a sea serpent the other day off Wells. It was like one he once saw in the Caribbean Sea, except that it has grown considerably. It held its head, the size of a barrel, high in the air; its eyes, as big as saucers, gleamed with a marvelous light, and its huge open mouth was armed with triple rows of teeth. The paper that reports this says the old salt is not addicted to drink.

Mrs. Prudence Crandall Philleg, now living in a "three-room pioneer box house" at Elk Falls, Kan., who has just been compensated by the Connecticut Assembly with an annuity of $400 for outrages sustained 53 years ago when she was driven out of a Connecticut town for keeping a school for nergo girls, has written a grateful letter of thanks for the relief at last afforded. She is under especial obligations to the press and to progressive persons who petitioned in her behalf as well as to the Legislature, and notes the change in Connecticut sentiment as follows: "In 1833, when the law was passed by which my life prospects were destroyed it was celebrated by ringing the bell hung in the steeple of the church, into which we were not allowed to enter, and by firing a cannon thirteen times, placed upon an eminence a few rods from my door; and to-day when your telegram arrived, the only jubilant display I wished to make was to have a private nook where my tears of joy and gratitude could flow unobserved for the change that has been wrought in the views and feelings of the mass of the people.

The followir g story is told of an enterprising Toronto jobber, the events having taken place some time ago: The merchant in question, having heard of the arrival of a country trader who was know to be a large purchaser and of unquestionable credit, was resolved to get him to visit his establishment, and once there, he felt sure he could secure him as a customer. He accordingly sent out one of his drummers, of whom he had quite a number, adapted to every taste and disposition. The one sent, however, returned without success. No. 2 was dispatched, with no better result, and again No. 3, and so on until all had gone and come back without their man. The merchant now determined to go himself, and finding that brandy and water and free tickets to the theater were of no avail, for the country trader did not take one or go to the other, he was reduced to the necessity of employing a ruse, which, as the sequel shows, was simple as well as effectual. On taking his departure after a pleasant interview the merchant took care to commit the "mistake" of taking the trader's hat instead of his own. Next morning, as was expected, the merchant received a prompt visit at his store from the trader, who came to look up the hat which he supposed had been hurriedly exchanged. This was what the merchant wanted, and through this means he sold a good bill of goods and secured a regular customer.

THE LIME KILN CLUB.

Just previous to the opening of the meeting Elder Juneberry Davis and Judge Holdback Johnson got into a dispute as to whether the crow-bar belonged to the Glacial Epoch or the Drift Period, and after some hot words had passed the Elder punched the Judge on the nose and received a crack on the jaw in return. Brother Gardner came in as they were pulled apart, but he seemed to take no notice of the affair and nothing was said until the meeting opened. Then he looked around the hall and observed:

"If Elder Juneberry Davis an' Judge Heldback Johnson am in de hall to-night I should like to spoke a few remarks to 'em."

Both gentlemen walked forward to the platform with anxiety depicted on their faces, and the President continued:

"Elder Davis, when did dat Glacial Epoch take place?'

"I dunno, sah."

"Judge Holdback, what do you know 'bout de Drift Period?"

"I reckon dar' was a good deal o' driftin' aroun', sah."

"Yes, I s'pose dar' was. Didn't happen to drift any 'taters an' meat your way, did it?"

"No, sah."

"Elder Davis, did dat Glacial Epoch pay up any of your back rent or git new shoes fur de chillen?"

"No, sah."

"Dat's 'nuff; you kin boaf sot down. While I blame two old members like you for sottin' a bad example befo' de club, I must at de same time acknowledge dat it am only de weakness of human natur'. Moas' of us would sooner fight over de sige of de world dan to resent a straight insult.

"We would argy longer to convince a man about de size of Noah's ark dan to convert him to our religun of de present day.

"We let our chil'en go bar'fut while we hunt fur evidence to convict de Gauls of shiftlessness.

"We spend hours assertin' an' denyin' dat de moon am inhabited, while fifteen minutes used to fix de bottom hinge on de front gait am looked upon as time frown away.

"While we sot an' wonder why Sodom and Gomorrah didn't behave deirselves an' escape destruckshun, de ole woman scrapes de bottom of de flour-bar'l, an' de fiah goes out in de kitchen stove.

"Jist what sige de crow-bar belongs to, or who invented it, or why it was invented, am questions which needn't trouble any member of dis club. De fack dat de crow-bar am heah wid us should satisfy all. Let us now proceed to attack de bizness which has called us together.

The Secretary announced the receipt of a Japanese newspaper called the Rom ji Zas-shi, published at Tokio. The proceedings of the Lime-Kiln Club at one of its January meetings was as follows:

"Brother Gardner konnichi no arisama taru kaku no gotoku ni gaikoku kosai no shigeki wo ukete, bummei no shimpo wa hi wo ote sumiyaka naru ni, shin-jibutsu no masumasu waga ni yunyu shi kitaru wa ikioi no shikarashimuru tokoro nari to su Giveadam Jones ni waga kokumin ga sono shin-jibutsu ni meiaho wo kudasu ni atari, onoono katte shidai naru moji we moohiite, onoono tokito no imi wo arawasu koto ata wazaru toki wa; mei-jitsu no aida ni soi wo shozuru mono zokuzoku idete, shorai ni ikanaru keka wo shozuka bakari-shirubekarazaru nari. On motion of Judge Baldy Cahiff the Secretary was instructed to return the thanks of the club to Seko Naohiko, Tanaka Toyotara and Romaji Kai, the editors and proprietors of the Romaji Zasshi.

DON'T KNOW HIM.

A communication from Talbot, Mich., stated that:

"About four weeks ago a colored man struck this town who gave his name as Gen Montgomery Scott, and claimed to be a member of the Lime-Kiln Club and a cousin of the King of Dahomey. The General was selling what he termed 'Scott's Death to Corns,' together with a cream tooth paste. With every box or bottle sold for twenty-five cents he gave a photograph of Brother Gardner. He was here about two weeks, and then suddenly skipped. Among the thirty or forty colored people who purchased his corn-salve every single man has been rendered a cripple; those who used the tooth-paste find their teeth ready to fall out. You will soon receive a visit from a Talbot lawyer, who will be authorized to settle this case with your club for the sum of $40 000. We are good-natured and long-suffering, but we propose to put a stop to this sort of business.

TWO HUNDRED INDIGNANT CITIZENS."

The Secretary said that he had carefully consulted the rolls, but had failed to find the name of Gen. Scott thereon. It was likely that he was one of the dozen impostors traveling around the country and using the name of the club to further their ends.

CHARTER GRANTED

A petition signed by sixty-four colored residents of Lunenburg, N. S., set forth the following facts:

1. They sighed for intellectual progression.

2. They had no place to hang out o' nights.

3 They felt that they could do the whole continent good.

4. Their watchword was: "De Taller Candle Nebber Explodes."

And they would humbly petition that authority be granted them to organize a Lime-Kiln Club, and a charter granted them to work to the thirty-first degree.

The petition was reccommended by the Warden and Counsellors of Lunenburg County, together with Capt. A. J Wolf, S. Watson Oxner, F B Wade, Dr. C. C. Aitken and James Dowling. On motion of Judge Chewse the petition was granted and the Secretary instructed to forward the charter.

NOT CARRIED.

Waydown Bebee then offered the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas, Medical science has demonstrated de fack dat de habit of drinkin' ice-water has a tendency to bring on heart disease, lumbago, liver complaint, insomnia and Mr. Bright's disease; now darfore

"Resolved, Dat dis Lime-Kiln Club not only abstains from ice-water doorin' de comin' summer, but it advises de cull'd people of dis kentry to do de same thing."

Prof. Ambidexter Smith, Giveadam Jones, Samuel Shin and Sir John Skinner opposed the resolution, while Elder Toots, Whalebone Howker, Cæsar Johnston and others favored it, and upon a vote being taken a tie was the result. Brother Gardner said he did not care to take the responsibility of a decision on his shoulders, and suggested as a compromise that Sundown Davis be submitted to a series of experiments from May to October to determine the matter. The suggestion was accepted and the resolution withdrawn.

MILITARY REPORT

Col. Erastus White, of the Committee on Military Affairs, reported that his committee had carefully investigated the subject of defenses, as required by a late resolution and had reached the following conclusion:

1 In case of war the enemy's fleet could easily bombard any city on the coast. We would therefore suggest that all these cities be moved back fourteen mile.

2. The enemy would have no trouble in landing troops on our shores. The only trouble would be in getting any off them alive again. The only suggestion we have to offer is that Ben Butler be notified to be on hand early in the morning.

3 If a new Paradise Hall be erected it should be placed at least twelve miles from any spot accessible to the gun-boats.

4. We don't want a war, but if one happens to fall out of a tree and hit us we shan't run away.

5. It is better to apologize than to get licked. This advice is for such nations as may feel like knocking the chip off our shoulder.

The report was accepted and adopted, and all unfinished business being placed on a shelf to dry, the meeting adjourned.

The Good Die Young.

The right kind of a fellow is modest and mellow
And generous and brave and benign;
His nature's apparent and clear and transparent like yours, gentle reader, and mine.
He has no verbosity, no tongue tortuosity, and he never is boastful and loud;
He is gentle and quiet and plain in his diet and never gets mad in a crowd;
He's grand and majestic, yet meek and domestic, and spends his spare evenings at home;
He's a tireless searcher for all kinds of virtue like the author and proprietor of this pome;
He don't play the fiddle, part his hair in the middle, nor dress like an Anglican dude.
When he goes to a party with Meigs or McCarty he never is noisy and rude;
He lives in frugality and sweet conjugality, and wants pie but two times a day;
He never eats onions nor treads on your bunions nor growls when you get in his way;
He's wise and he's witty, persevering and gritty, and has a magnificent head;
He's all right and sweetness, he's thorough completeness, he's perfection in short—but he's dead!

WHAT'S ALL THIS NOISE AND BUSTLE ABOUT?

The Prince of Wales is said to be troubled with chronic dyspepsia. Too much feasting will bring a prince as well as a pauper to grief. The stomach of royalty differs in no way from the stomach of every day folk. As the Prince sets the fashion in England dyspepsia should be very popular there now. In fact, no real "swell" can afford to be without it.

The number of suicides at Monaco seems to be increasing at an alarming rate. Many of the noblest families of Austria have been thrown into mourning by the death of their sons at Monte Carlo, who, after losing even 1,000 at the gaming table, blew his brains out in the doorway of Monsieur Blanc's establishment on the 20th February last. It was announced on good authority that the Italian Consul of Monaco has just been sent for at Rome for falsifying, and in some way totally suppressing, the reports of the deaths by suicide at Monte Carlo of Italians.

Royalists Learning to Labor.

Prince Ludwig, of Battenberg, who, like the Russian princes, has been taught a handicraft, was lately initiated into the mysteries of printing. Having mastered the business he taught it to his wife, and the princely pair have just set up in business and printed a book of 200 pages, entitled "My Journey to Bulgaria." The edition of this little volume, which is intended only for private circulation, is the Countess Maria, of Erbach, Schoenberg, Prince Alexander's sister. The Knights of Labor would hardly approve of Prince and Princess Ludwig's competition, but they could find little fault with their printing.

THE FARM

Plowing.

Farmers, as a general rule, says one of them in a recent letter, do not take pains enough with this part of their farm work. I am convinced that I can get more clear profit from an acre that is well plowed than from an acre that is only half plowed. What I mean by half plowed is where it is plowed by guess, deep here and shallow there, a wide furrow here and a narrow one there, with the furrows standing on edges or turned over very flat. We can do good plowing just as easily and just as fast as we can do it over.

The first thing in good plowing is to commence right. In marking out a bed I use two stakes, one at the opposite end of the field from which I begin to plow and the other about eight rods from this toward the place where I begin. Get the stakes in line with the furrow where you start, and then sight some object away beyond the first stake, so that you set in exact line with the stakes and furrow where you begin, and then go ahead with the plow until you come to the first stake. Stop and take the stake down and lay it to one side out of the way, and then go ahead again, taking the end stake and the object beyond for your guide. In plowing the first two times around set your plow-wheel so as not to plow more than 4½ inches deep. After you have gone thus far adjust your wheel so as to plow the depth you wish to have your plowing done. By plowing as I have described we avoid the high ridge furrow we would have if we plowed the first two times around as deep as we plow the rest of the bed.

In plowing the first two furrows (the first time around) we have two essential things to look after. First, to do our plowing right; second, to turn the furrows over in good shape, and have the edges of the furrows meet and set firmly together. This will prevent the grass from growing up between the furrows to a great extent. Now you can go ahead and finish up our bed. Be careful to keep the furrows straight and the full width the entire length of the field. If you hold your plow firm and steady your furrows will be as straight as a line. Keep your beds the same width at both ends of the field, and then when we come to finish we have only one furrow the entire length of the field to turn out. This, I think, is much better than to have one end finished by turning from one to five furrows on the other end to turn out yet. Right here I would like to say a word which I consider very important in doing a good job of plowing. It is this: I consider it very essential that the driver and team understand each other very well. If you have a good, strong, well-kept team, and one that is steady and willing to pull, I see no reason why we can't do our plowing in a workmanlike manner.

Sowing Grass Seed.

The amount of seed required for an acre of ground intended for grass cannot be properly estimated, although most farmers sow a given quantity every year without giving proper consideration to the quality of the seed or the condition of the soil. The soil may be in excellent condition to-day for seeding, but may require double the quantity of seeds in two or three days after. In the first place, seed will not germinate unless the proper conditions are favorable for so doing. When the ground is hard, as is sometimes the case when grass seed is sown on growing grain, there are a great many forces against the seed. Birds eat much of it, while a large portion of it rots on the surface. In such cases a large quantity of seed is necessary. Many of the poor "catches" of clover are due to not using enough in seeding. A light harrow passed over the field immediately after the seeding, when the ground is hard, will not only cover the seed, but greatly benefit the grain crop. When grain is sown in the spring the grass seed should be sown at the same time, in order that both may have the advantage of the thorough preparation of the soil, and less seed will then be required. Even a "brushing" of the field after sowing grass seed is better than simply scattering it on the surface. It is not too late for seed yet, nor should the opportunities be thrown away of taking advantage of the spring rains. In sowing seed do not trust entirely to the sower, and there will be a better chance of the seed germinating.

The Cruelties of Heathenism.

On his way to the centre of Africa, Mr. S. Arnot wrote from Bihe as follows to Mr. Sanders at Bailundu, concerning "a native barbarity": "A few days ago I met with a little boy, about eight years of age, who belongs to Ruskit's town close by, going about with both his hands in a sad mess. The left one was completely distorted and three of the fingers jointed together in one large mass, the palm bulging forward. The arm above the wrist was skinned and also the right hand. I found that this youngster had been out visiting at the king's town or somewhere near there. The boy in playing about had stolen some beans belonging to a daughter of Jamba Yamina, the king, they call her Naroma Cunengile, who, to punish the child for stealing her beans, put his hands into a pot of boiling water. I have seen something of that work before, and from the state of the child's hand she must have kept the left hand, at least, for a few seconds in the water. The poor little fellow, smart and good-looking, is injured for life, and this creature in woman's shape has not been called in question for her cruelty. If you are passing here at any time, you could see the child; the boiled hand beggars description."

To this Mr. Sanders adds:—

"People talk of the innocence of the heathen, but they only need to live in a heathen land to learn that 'the dark places of the earth are full of the inhabitants of cruelty.' What do you think of a man taking his hands full of dried grass, setting it on fire and then applying it to the naked shoulders and breast of his wife, simply because his beans were not cooked quite as soon as he thought they ought to be? This has happened here in Chilumi.

A royal battle took place between a bull and a buck, the latter weighing over 200 pounds, on the farm of the Hon. Oscar Turner in Ballard county, Kentucky. The two were found dead. The bull had received seven thrusts from the horns of the buck, the last being through the heart.

A young married lady who moved into the country from a city home considered keeping hens a pleasant and profitable duty. As she became more absorbed in the pursuit her enthusiasm increased, and "hens" made a favorite subject of her thoughts and conversation. During one of her animated descriptions of success, a friend inquired: "Are your hens good hens?" "Oh, yes," she replied in a delighted tone, "they haven't laid a bad egg yet."

"We feel," writes a Western editor, "that an apology is due to Widow Grimes. In our issue of last week we stated that she had eloped with an 18-year-old man. The truth is that she was thrown from an 8-year-old mare, which she was riding in a lope, and which slipped and fell. Mistakes will happen in the best-regulated newspaper-offices, and we are confident that when we state the item was sent over a telephone-wire no other apology will be needed."

It is said to be Japanese etiquette for a gentleman caller never to leave the house of a lady friend until she has given him the signal for departure. There are a great many young men in this country who never leave the house of a lady friend until she gives the signal, but it is not etiquette. And it is not healthy, either. It deprives both parties of too much sleep. Sometimes the signal is so long delayed that the old folks are compelled to give it. And that is not very healthy either—especially for the young man.

Chicago Damsel (to New York dude who has been talking about "dear old London, doncherknow')—"Are you a relation of the Browns, of London, Mr. Brown?" And, really, she shouldn't go on as she does with young Mr. Milds. And he's coming, too? Nice fellow, extremely nice fellow, if he does make me think of a monkey every time I look at him. And Miss Jelle? Lovely girl! Pity she's so very plain and unpleasantly rude. And Ritewell, the author? Clever man, but horribly conceited. And Mrs. Wood? Ah, there's a charming old lady! I admire her so much for this reason: You never hear her say a word against anybody."

He said: "Gentlemen of the jury, charging a jury is a new business to me, as this is my first case. You have heard all the evidence, as well as myself; you have also heard what the learned counsel have said. If you believe what the counsel for the plaintiff has told you your verdict will be for the plaintiff; but if, on the other hand, you believe what the defendant's counsel has told you, then you will give a verdict for the defendant. But if you are like me, and don't believe what either of them have said, then I'll be hanged if I know what you will do. Constable, take charge of the jury."

STODDARD'S MULE.

A Story of How It Broke Ferryman Daggett's Business.

Many years ago down in Idaho, during a gold excitement, a good many men went into the country to make money outside the gold hunting industry. Their idea was to make the old fellows delve for the gold while they appropriated it afterward. Rollin Daggett, afterwards Nevada's congressman, says the Carson (Nev) Appeal, established a ferryboat on a small creek and named the place "Death's Ford," at the same time inventing a musty legend to the effect that it was thus named because so many lives had been lost in the attempt to cross it. The stream was not over a dozen yards wide and the water nowhere over two feet deep, but he rigged up a flatboat and pulled it back and forth by a rope contrivance. Whenever prospectors crossed he regaled them with horrible tales of the treachery of the stream, and the remorseless quicksands which had drawn so many men and mules to terrible deaths.

In the night when he ferried people over he would caution them not to get too near the edge of the boat, as a fall overboard was certain death. By letting the dim old lantern go out and making slow time he frequently impressed the passengers with the idea that the stream was half a mile wide; For night trips he charged $5, but if the wind was high and the weather bad he struck sanguine prospecters for much larger sums. In the daytime $1 was his modest charge.

He went along in this way for several months, the men who rushed to the hills looking upon him as the benefactor to his race by this conquering of so formidable an obstacle to travel as "Death's Ford." One day Charlie Stoddard, the prometer, appeared on the bank with a mule and boarded the flatboat to cross. In the midst of the stream, just when the ferryman was telling how dangerous the place was, the mule grew restless and fell overboard. One leg caught on a rope and he got his head under water, and, unable to extricate himself, was drowned. When he was cut loose he lay there in the middle of "Death's Ford" half out of water so that all who came along saw what a miserable sham the ferry was, and that any four-footed animal could walk across. Daggett tried to get the mule away but he was too heavy to budge, and so he lay there in sight for weeks, until Daggett's business as ferryman was ruined. That's the reason old Dag hardly ever speaks to Charlie Stoddard when he meets him.

Unpleasant Camping Out.

On the plains of Afghanistan, in Central Asia, a joint commission of Englishmen and Russians is slowly laying down the boundary line which, it is hoped, will mark the farthest limit of Russian progress southward on the road toward the English possessions in India.

A correspondent who is with the commission writes to the London "Pioneer" an account of the cold weather which has been experienced. Those who have enjoyed the delights of camping out in the long summer vacation will perhaps shiver a little at this story of tent life in the valley of the Oxus:

On the night of the 23rd of December the thermometer went down to 2 deg. below zero. "One's breath froze into ice on one's pillow, and many of us found it difficult to sleep despite all the clothes we could pile on. I my self was awoke toward morning by a loud report, which I found was caused by the bursting of a bottle of what had been drinking water, but which had turned into a block of ice and burst under my bed, and once awake the cold was too intense to get to sleep again. At nine in the morning the thermometer was still only at 6 deg., and it continued to freeze all the day through, despite the sun. In the afternoon I was out shooting with the sun full on my face, yet my breath froze on my moustache the whole time. The poor cook, I think, had the hardest time of it. His eggs, he says, are all frozen hard, and he can make nothing of them; and further, as fast as he roasts his joint on one side it freezes, he says, on the other. I confess, though, that I did not witness the latter. Writing with ink, of course, is an utter impossibility—every ink pot in camp contains simply a solid block of ice, and it is no use in thawing it, as it freezes on the paper before it has time to dry. I am writing this, therefore, in pencil. It is wonderful how well the men and followers are standing the cold, but a liberal issue of meat and tea and sugar seems to make them all proof against any thing. I must say, though, that they are precious quiet in the mornings, and loath indeed to get up; their ablutions, too, I dare say, are few and far between, but really I cannot blame them. When it comes to our having to thaw our tooth brush every time we have to use it, and when everything around is frozen hard, little wonder that the poor Hindu is chary of touching water. The bheesties, I think, I pity most. They can fill their mussucks certainly at the running canal, although even that is frozen over, but by the time they get back into camp the water they are carrying is frozen, and absolutely refuses to run out of the mussuck again.

Disraeli's Assurance.

A little volume has recently been published made up of the correspondence of Lord Beaconsfield with his sister in the years 1832-1842. This man's career was indeed wonderful, and it is interesting to observe the young Hebrew novelist, Benjamin Disraeli, foretelling his subsequent career. His firm belief in his talents is thus expressed in a letter written to his sister in 1833:

Went to the House of Commons to hear Bulwer adjourn the House; was there yesterday afternoon during the whole debate—one of the finest we have had for years. Bulwer spoke, but he is physically disqualified for an orator, and, in spite of all his exertions, can never succeed. He was heard with great attention, and is evidently backed by a party. Heard Macaulay's best speech, Shiel, and Charles Grant. Macaulay admirable; but between ourselves I could floor them all. This entre nous: I was never more confident of anything than that I could carry everything before me in that House. The time will come!"

His [illegible] Beaconsfield, the editor of the collection, adds with evident pride this foot-note: "Thirty-five years after he was Prime Minister."

Caged Fires.

The fate of the Oregon has shown the danger to be dreaded from water, and the more fortunate experience of the steamer Crystal only two months ago, suggests the peril in which a vessel may be placed by fire. In the case of the Crystal the bulkheads were undoubtedly of great assistance.

On January 11 John Gray, the steward, thought he could feel unusual heat in his room. He waited until 8 o'clock, and then went into the chief officer's room to report his suspicions. When he opened the stateroom door he was met by a dense cloud of smoke, and with difficulty aroused the mate. A volume of smoke was pouring in at a small hole bored through the bulkhead to allow a telegraph wire to run from the forward steering wheel to the after one, and it was four hours before the mate was returned to consciousness. The second officer, whose room was abaft the mate's with a similar aperture in the bulkhead, was also unconscious. The vessel was then 700 miles east of Newfoundland.

When the full extent of the danger was made known to Captain Stannard, he at once ordered all the openings described to be closed up and the hatches battened down. The ship is divided into four water-tight compartments, with iron bulkheads seperating them. That one where the fire was located was about forty feet long, and reached from the upper deck to the keelson. There were stowed bales of jute, carpets, paper stock and burlap, and Captain Stannard rightly concluded it to be useless to attempt to distinguish the fire with water. The smoke from the smoldering mass permeated every corner of the vessel and made it impossible for the men to remain below decks. Several of them were prostrated during the passage and had to be cared for in the engine room.

A consultation of the officers was held, and all but the captain thought it advisable to make for St. John's or Halifax. Some dissatisfaction was expressed when Captain Stannard made up his mind that he would bring the vessel to New York.

The succeeding ten days and nights were filled with apprehension. The decks are of iron covered with wood, and it was feared that before reaching port the heat would force its way upward to the deck and give vent to the smoldering flames. Both fore and aft bulkheads of the compartment containing the fire, it was feared, would give way, and then the flames would have a clean sweep fore and aft. But with a steady courage and admirable coolness the captain continued on his course and quieted the fear of his crew.

"I have been at sea many years and have suffered shipwreck," he said, "but never was I placed in so terrible a position as on this passage. Sailors can fight all the elements except fire. In a gale of wind, so occupied are the crew with their duties that they have but little time to think of danger, but in this case all know their fearful peril."

The consignees are much pleased with the manner in which Captain Stannard acted, and say that to his determination is due the safe arrival of the ship. The damage to the cargo is said to be in the neighborhood of $10 000, mostly covered by insurance

The Deadly Knife in Sicily.

A horrible deed of blood committed near Girgenti gives an illustration of the use of the knife in the Island of Sicily. Two butchers, father and son, of the name of Indelicato, who kept a shop in that town, not long since took two brothers, named Alfonso and Giovanni Cannetonis into partnership. Before long the Cannetonis began to trade in lambs' carcasses separately on their own account, and disagreements arose, which ultimately led to a collision between Baldassare Indelicato and Alfonso Cannetoni. They drew their butcher's knives from their belts on each other. Alfonso aimed a well-directed blow at Baldassare. He parried it with his left arm, which was cut to the bone, and at the same instant drove his knife into the heart of Alfonso, who fell dead on the spot. At that moment a young son of Alfonso, aged 19, came up with a bludgeon to his father's assistance. Baldassare struck him to the ground, and then cut his throat across, "as he would have slaughtered a sheep." Mad with rage, Baldassare then rushed into the shop, and taking Giovanni the brother of Alfonso, by surprise, killed him with a slash across the abdomen. Turning then to leave the shop, he inflicted a serious wound on a person just entering. All this occurred within the space of four minutes, the result of the collision being three persons killed and two wounded.

Servants in India.

"In India," said a gentleman with an Oriental tan on his face, "the customs with regard to the servants are somewhat peculiar. When a man is invited to a dinner party, or is sitting at the table in his boarding-house, his own 'bearer,' or body servant, stands behind his chair to wait upon him. The exigencies of the feast often make it necessary for a bearer to serve somebody other than his master, but on such occasions the guest is expected to overlook any shortcomings of which the attendant may be guilty; for in India the rule, 'Insult my servant, and you insult me,' is acknowledged everywhere. Once at a boarding-house on the Cheuringee road, in Calcutta, I saw a bearer who was serving a stout, choleric Englishman with curry, spill a little of the copper-colored mixture on his trousers. Furiously turning around, the angry Briton found that the delinquent was not his own bearer, but the employee of a gentleman sitting at the other side of the table. 'Well, sir,' he said to his vis-a-vis, 'I won't kick your servant, but, by god, sir, I'll kick my own!' and an astonished and innocent bearer, who was twenty feet away when the offence was committed, was ignominiously kicked out of the room."

Four Years of Faithful Service.

"Patrick, are you sure you can handle a pair of horses if they're a little vicious?"

"Be gorra, I can, sur."

"How long were you in your last place?"

"Four years, sur."

"That speaks well for you. You don't drink?"

"Whisky, do you mean? Sure, niver a drop passed my lips darin' all that time, sur."

"Good for you, Patrick. Oh, by the by, where were you during those four years?"

"I was in jail, sur."

FEEDING ON HUMAN FLESH.

Awful Sufferings of Four Canadian Fishermen in an Open Boat.

Full details of the terrible story of cannibalism have been obtained from only one of the survivors who is able to speak of the affair. The boat landed at Louisburg, N. S., the other afternoon, with two exhausted survivors. A ghastly sight met the gaze of the crowd that assembled about the boat when from beneath the piece of canvas covering them in the stern were brought to light the remains of James McDonald and Angus McDonald. The former was in a frightfully mutilated condition. The right arm was missing from the elbow, the throat was cut and hacked in a sickening manner and two great pieces of flesh had been chopped, as by a knife, from each thigh. In the bottom of the boat in a pool of blood, which washed to and fro with the motion of the waves, lay three that had been bitten, partly masticated and then spat out. The spectacle was of a nature witnessed but once in a lifetime, and the feelings of those looking on were so wrought with horror that the strongest in the crowd turned away, unable to stand it any longer. The two half-perished survivors of the terrible voyage are Colin Chisholm, of Harbor Bouche, N. S., and Angus McEachern, of Long Point, Strait of Canso. Chisholm told the following story: "We belonged to the American fishing schooner Cisely H. Low, Captain McKenzie. The vessel had fourteen hands altogether, and sailed from Gloucester on Wednesday March 15. After a fair passage we arrived on the Western banks on the succeeding Tuesday. On the Monday following, about eight o'clock in the morning, McEachern and myself left the vessel to attend to our trawls in company with another dory containing the two McDonalds. While at our work fog suddenly shut down, hiding the vessel from our view. As soon as the trawls were all set we started to find the schooner, and in trying to do so fell in with the other boat. No answer came to our signals and we concluded

LARGE PIECES OF HUMAN FLESH

WE WERE LOST.

We kept in company all day and night and until noon of the following day, when the McDonalds got into our dory and we set the other adrift after securing her oars. We observed a sail but could not attract their attention. We had neither food nor water and began to suffer awfully. On Thursday evening James McDonald, who was more thinly clad than the rest and had been gradually growing weaker and weaker from hunger and exposure, felt that he was dying, and looking at the three of us from the stern where he was lying, said in a voice I shall never forget, "Good by! good by, mates! I am dying." These were his last words. We kept his body, thinking the rest of us might yet be rescued. We kept on in the direction we thought the land lay, though every stroke was weaker than the last, and none knew at what moment one of us would give up in despair. On Friday, after James McDonald died, Angus McDonald said he was starving and thirsty, and that as he must have something to eat and drink he was going

TO DRINK JIM'S BLOOD.

He had no sooner uttered the words than he seized his knife and cut off Jim's arm; sucking some of the blood and eating some of the flesh. Then looking at me with his mouth smeared and with a piece of flesh in his hand, he asked me if I would have some, remarking at the time that the blood tasted like cream, I tasted it, and at once spat it out, saying if I was to die within an hour I would neither eat the flesh or drink the blood. In the afternoon Angus again turned to me and said:—'I am going to cut Jim's throat to get some more blood.' I begged him not to do so, saying:—"For God's sake, whatever else you do, don't cut his throat. Do what you like, but don't do that." In the morning we found he had cut the dead man's throat, and, not finding any blood there, had also cut pieces of flesh out of his left thigh. His hunger and thirst not being then appeased, Angus cut another piece of flesh out of Jim's right thigh and during Saturday

ATE SEVERAL PIECES.

Mr. McEachern attempted to eat some, but could not. The taste made him sick. On Saturday night, "having kept rowing, we met a quantity of drift ice and we were then, I should judge, sixty miles east southeast of Guyon Island. By this time Angus McDonald, I noticed, was becoming crazy and going aft to try to get him to lay down, he picked up an oar and struck me twice, but not hurting me much. Sometime afterward McEachern and myself lay down to sleep. At daylight we awoke, to find that Angus McDonald had thrown all the oars overboard. We took the thwarts and paddled through the ice searching for the oars, and at last found five of them. All day Sunday we rowed through the ice as best our weakness would permit us. About noon never having spoken after striking me the previous day. As evening drew near we made out what afterwards proved to be Guyon Island, but darkness coming on and squalls setting in we were then unable to find it. We lay down to sleep but cold and anxiety to reach land made sleep impossible. All night long the waves beat over us, and when dawn broke at last we were covered with ice and hardly able to move, but land was now close by, and by strenuous efforts we managed to make gradual headway. About ten o'clock on Monday morning our dory grounded on the beach of the island, and the lighthouse keeper, who had observed us through the ice, came down with his two boys and carried us up to his house. Neither of us was able to walk when we were assisted to land; the feet of both of us had turned purple and raw and were horribly swollen. After we got into the ice we used to suck it to allay our thirst, and that was the only thing we had in the shape of water for over eight days. Now it is all over, and I am very thankful to God for having been preserved."

ANGUS DIED INSANE,

The codfish continues to grow indefinitely, without regard to age, so long as it has a plentiful supply of food. The eldest codfish are the largest, and they sometimes grow to be as long as a man is high. They swim about near the bottom of the sea, not often ascending to the surface, feeding on all sorts of animal life, such as crabs, shell fish and other small fish, but not on vegetable.

The Standard.

MARKDALE APRIL 29, 1886

THE KEPPEL TRAGEDY.

Our readers will remember an item in the STANDARD a few weeks ago in reference to the burning of a house in Keppel township, near Wiarton, in which two men—Jas. A. Bailey and a hired man, whose name is unknown—perished in the flames.

A post mortem examination was held and marks of violence found on the bodies, and evidence going to show that a murder had been committed, and that the house was set on fire to cover the black deed.

Detective Rogers has since been working up the case, and has succeeded in unravelling the mystery so far as to the confession of one who knows the secret and the arrest of the supposed guilty parties who are now in Owen Sound gaol.

The parties arrested are Ellen McCleary, a girl who lives next door to the burned house; Charles McCleary, her brother; James King, and John Wilson. The evidence so far point strongly to the guilt of the two last named. Other witnesses are expected to throw further light on the affair.

Bailey was not murdered for money but through jealousy.

Kimberley.

From our own correspondent.

Kimberley people are doing a good work in building sidewalk. I believe it is the first in the township.

Fall wheat is looking better since the late rain; it promises an average crop.

James O'Brian has moved from the bleak and inhospitable shores of Artemesia to the more congenial neighborhood of Kimberley.

John Hurlbert, one of the early pioneers here, is going to move to the N. W. soon. The Orangemen presented him with a medal, for his bravery, I suppose, in reminding a few Catholics here of defeat at the Boyne. However, be that as it may, no matter how we may differ in opinion as to the prudence and manliness of refreshing people's memories of those old strifes, one thing is certain Mr. Hurlbert, as a neighbor, is highly respected, and we wish him success and happiness in his new N. W. home

SIXTY-SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF ODDFELLOWSHIP.

I. O. O. F.

SERMON BY REV. W. AYERS.

The members of Dufferin Lodge I. O. O. F. of this village celebrated the sixty-seventh anniversary of Oddfellowship in America by attending divine service in the Methodist church here on Sabbath evening last. The brethren assembled in their Hall about 6 p.m. After clothing in regalia marched to the church. Rev. Bro. W. Ayers conducted the service, reading for scripture lesson the 20th chap. of the First Book of Samuel, and selecting for his text the 11, 12 & 13 verses of 31st chap. of First Samuel.

"And they found an Egyptian in the field and brought him to David, and gave him bread and he did eat; and they made him drink water. And they gave him a piece of a cake of figs and two clusters of raisins, and when he had eaten his epirit came again to him for he had eaten no bread nor drank any water, three days and three nights," &c., &c.

The speaker then went forward to prove that the lesson taught in the text was that which was daily and weekly being practiced by true Oddfellows. The principal planks in Oddfellowship being, 1st, Friendship; 2nd, Love, and 3rd, Truth. It afforded a broad platform on which all who desired could benefit their fellow beings. The order was strictly religious and highly moral, and he regarded Oddfellowship as the Handmaid of Religion. Closing, he urged every brother and member to love his Heavenly Father, and to ever look and pray for the dawning of that better day when one shall not have to say to his neighbor "Know ye the Lord."

During the service the choir rendered a very choice anthem. Miss Richardson sang a solo very sweetly and much to the delight of all who heard her

On Monday evening the members with their families, of Dufferin Lodge I. O. O. F. assembled in their Hall in the capacity of a social gathering to further celebrate the anniversary of the order. Good things were provided by the ladies. Various amusements were entered into during the evening, and at the close a short but interesting programme was gone through, when all separated for their homes well pleased with the evening's enjoyment.

Holland Centre.

From our own Correspondent.

After a long sleep I awake to give my dream.

Fine weather the past two weeks, and farmers getting on well with spring work. Fall wheat is looking well, but there is a smaller acreage sown than usual.

Mr. Walter Perry, son of the Rev. D. Perry, is home on a visit.

Mr. McIntyre, Presbyterian minister, and family have moved here, being stationed here for six months in place of Mr. Mann as announced some time since.

There was joy at the house of Mr. Geo. Crowther the other day when a daughter came to town—the first in ten years of married life.—In honor of the event Mayor Crowther proclaimed a civic holiday. The flag on the "Queen's Hotel" could be seen all over town. We were first under the impression that Ireland has secured Home Rule, but soon learned the true cause of the rejoicing.

Our sidewalks are in need of repair; hope our Mayor will attend, else there will be a change in our ballot next election.

John Doyle of Sullivan, brother of Stewart Doyle of this place, was instantly killed by a falling tree while chopping recently.

John Nite, one of the oldest settlers of Holland, died on the 16th inst., inflamation of the Lungs was the cause.

John Trouten, one of the hands in Lyman Anderson's Shingle Mill, got one hand badly mangled by a saw. The front finger had to be amputated and the next one will likely have to be.

THOSE NEW AND RENEWED SUBSCRIBERS.

C. Price is to the front with Spring and Summer goods, and the ladies appear to know it, as they are flocking in, while the gaid men are buisy in the field, not having time to poke their nose into domestic affairs, while Miss Blades supplies head gears in a becoming manner, adding several inches to the hight of the dear ones.

A SUCCESSFUL RESULT.

Mr. Frank Hendry, writing from Seaforth, says: "I purchased one bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters to puify my blood. It did purify it, and now I have excellent health." As a blood purifying tonic and system regulator the result of taking B. B. B. is always successful.

Editing a paper is a peculiar business.

If it contains much political matter, the people won't have it.

If it is neutral, they say we are afraid to offend.

If we publish foreign news, they say it's local news we want.

If we leave out foreign news, others say, they are more interested in that sort of news than the home.

If we have a few jokes, folks say we lack sense.

If we omit jokes, they say we are publishing but fossils.

If we publish original matter, they say we don't write our own editorials.

If we give a complimentary notice, we are censured for being partial.

If we don't, all hands say we are a great hog.

If we insert an article which pleases the ladies, the men become jealous, and vice versa.

If we stay in our office, they say we should be abroad looking after news.

If we go out, they say we don't attend to our business.

If we don't publish all the Church and Society concert and other notices, they exclaim great Scott! what do we keep you for.

If we publish serial stories, some say, what rubbish.

If we don't, others say the stories is all they care for.

Everybody knows just how to conduct a paper except the editor.

Another statistician has been statistic-king, and gives as the result of his labors the opinion that a large per cent. of the liars in the world were brought up in infancy on bottles, being fed, as it were a lie right at the start. Quite ingenious. Reader, were you brought up on a bottle? Beware the bottle, both young and old.

If your are afflicted with Rheumatism call on your druggist immediately and procure a bottle of West's World's Wonder or Family Liniment, it is a certain and positive cure. It is infallible for Sprains, Cuts, Bruises, Burns, Scalds and all diseases requiring external application. Price 25 cents and 50 cents per bottle. Sold by A. Turner & Co. April

AN EGYPTIAN ROMANCE.

A Story of Love and Wild Adventure, founded upon Startling Revelations in the Career of Arabi Pasha.

By the Author of "NIHA, THE NIHILIST," "THE RED RIDER," "THE RUSSIAN SPY, ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER LVII.

BEHIND THE CURTAIN IN THE HAREM OF THE WAR MINISTER.

Whilst the first victory upon Egyptian soil has thus been gained by her husband, Nellie is half guest and half captive within the pink walls of Arabi Pasha's palaces at Caire.

The war minister had kept his word by dispatching her and her parents thither, exactly as he had promised he would do, and here she has been during the whole of the five intervening weeks, leading a dull and sadly monotonous life behind the harem curtain, seeing her mother daily, but her father never once, for he might not enter into that supposed sanctuary of female loveliness though it oftimes screens female hideousness as well.

So Mr Trezarr is the guest of the war minister's only son, a pleasant gentlemanly youth, who does his best to make the banker's enforced imprisonment bearable to him, and never lost an opportunity of informing him that if he were to venture forth into the street he would assuredly be killed, and who has always some wondrous tale to tell of the sinking of British ironclads, or the annihilation of British armies, or that the Sultan was on his way to help them, for the Egyptain leaders were quite clever at the spreading of false reports as were the Russians.

Very similar tales were told to Nellie by Arabi Pasha's wife, only to her account was always added something of the miraculous, as was to be expected from a lady who believed in sorcery and always kept a dream interpeter in her employ in whose predictions she placed the most implicit confidence.

Nellie felt very uncomfortable in this lady's presence at first, lest she might know or guess the future that was intended to be in store for her and feel angry or hurt thereby. But she before long broached the subject of her own accord, and it did not appear to be at all a sore one.

"When you are my sister we shall love each other very much," she murmured gently.

"When I am your sister? I don't exactly understand?" answered Nellie; nor did she.

"Why, when you are Ahmed's wife we shall be sister, shall we not? That is what all wives of one man call each other in this country, and they generally love each other like real sisters as well. That is to say, when they have so good and kind a husband as Ahmed, you know."

"Then I must be your sister already, for the pasha believes that he has married me."

"Believes, little one? If he has done so he must know for certain, I should say."

"Well, he thinks so then," rejoined Nellie, petulantly, "but I am quite sure that he has not, first, because I was no consenting party, and secondly, because I was another man's wife at the time."

"Ah, but, little sister, if any one has made a mistake in the matter it must be yourself, for you are young and doubtless foolish, whilst Ahmed Arabi has the wisdom of more than double your years, and beside, he would not do wrong to the meanest thing that breathes. A good and blessed thing it is to be the wife of such a man, for she never hears an angry word drop from his lips. He is really one in a thousand, and now that he has sunk all the English ships and taken the English King prisoner he will doubtless be made the sovereign of all Egypt and will be almost as great as the Sultan himself."

His taking of the English King prisoner amused Nellie, despite the sorrows of her heart. After that she saw it would be a vain and foolish thing to pump the Valide Khanoum as to how the war was going on, since her replies would be very untrustworthy indeed.

From that date Nellie felt that she should know no rest until she was possessed of better information concerning affairs of moment outside her gilded prison.

Mrs. Trezarr accommodated herself to her changed position wonderfully well.

She felt a keen interest in the most trivial themes of harem gossip, and would roll her eyes and clap her hands at any marvelous narration as though to the manner born. As to Mr. Trezarr, she seldom even inquired after him, such conduct marking the difference between living with a husband twenty years and two hours.

One day the Valide Khaneum came into Nellie's little room with an open letter in her hand and a face that was very cheerful and bright, and addressing the fair girl by her usual affectionate epithet of "Little Sister," said to her in excited tones:

"I am the bearer of good new. I have received a letter from our lord and husband."

"And what news does his letter contain and how is he?" said Nellie, desirous as much for information on several points as she was anxious to put a stop to this indiscriminate praise of one whom she was firmly resolved should never be any more to her than he was at the present moment.

The Valide Khanoum quickly made answer:

"Praise be to Allah and his only prophet, he could not be better and he writes in the highest spirits. Hear what he writes, little sister, for though he writes in Arabic, as a true believer ever should. I will do my best to turn it into, I hope, understandable French."

Nellie nodded her head, for she was too agitated to speak, save when of necessity.

"Our lord and husband is a great man, but I need not trouble you with the commencement of his letter, since it mostly consists of compliments addressed to myself. I will dip into the middle of it at once, where he declares that he has at last got the Feringhee invaders in the hollow of his hand and has had to close it in order to utterly crush them. He next pays many compliments to their courage and the generalship of their chiefs, but says that their graves, nevertheless, await them at Tel-el-Kebir and that in another sun and moon, by which he means a day and night, they will have occupied them and Egypt be free. And now comes the all important part of our lord's letter, little sister. He goes on to say that the very hour in which he is crowned with victory he shall hurry hither and change from conqueror to slave in your presence, but he hopes my kind heart, quick sympathy and good counsel (what sugar plums of speech for the both of us!) have ere now taught us to yield freely and without regret to the inevitable (there you see, little sister, he says the inevitable and so there is no getting out of it,) though, if not, it will not much matter, he adds for it will only leave him the task he had intended for me, that of teaching you himself to bless the inevitable and to thank Allah that he had not given you to a Ghiour."

At this point the Valide Khaneum glanced up off the letter at her auditor, to note what effect it had made upon her and she uttered a little cry of mingled pity and consternation upon perceiving that her "little sister," as she delighted to call her, had sunk down upon a softly pillowed divan in a dead sweon.

CHAPTER LVIII.

FRANK DONELLY AT LAST CROSSES SWORDS WITH ARABI.

When Captain Donelly fell back with his little force on the main body of his regiment, carrying his wounded and the captured Egyptian battery, he received some praise from the colonel for the success which had attended his reconnaisance, and upon his representations and at his request Pat Monaghan was given a corporal's chevrons on the spot.

It was not the time to rest on a mere handful of laurels, however, for the war upon which they had entered was to be one of the sabre and the spur far more than of the cannon and the rifle.

Within twelve hours of this brush at El-Magfar Sir Garnet Wolseley felt strong enough to press on towards Cairo, for he knew that against an Oriental foe dash and daring were everything. With General Drury Lowe's splendid cavalry brigade, Graham's fire-eating Irish and Scottish infantry and the stolid English guards, under the Queen's third son, the Duke of Connaught, who, if not very quick in the advance, would at all events, be a deuced deal slower in running away, he prepared to carry a strong position at El-Mahuta, ten miles nearer to the capital

But the Egyptians found out that they only doubled in number the British and so retreated precipitately directly they came in view.

Thereupon, Drury Lowe's cavalry, comprising the Irish dragoons, the Life Guards and an Indian lance regiment, made a sweeping flank movement on Mahsameh station and the railway, hoping to get in their rear and cut them off to a man, but the Egyptians were so swift footed and the ground so bad for cavalry that he failed in this.

By midnight the British vanguard, consisting of General Graham's brigade of 1,800 bayonets, a Bengal lance regiment and our friends, the Irish dragoons, were at Khassasin, with their nearest supports half a dozen miles in their rear and the slow moving guards just as far to the rear of them again.

The British van had thus accomplished a quarter of the distance to Cairo with no loss at all to speak of, but now intelligence was gathered that at Tel-el-Kebir, some dozen miles in advance of them, Arabi Pasha had formed a perfect desert Gibraltar, with three lines of defenses, all defended by heavy batteries of Krupp guns, and that there he had displayed the green standard of the prophet and had called together the ulemas to bless his cannon and his cause, all this that his soldiery might be brought to consider defeat impossible.

Such a formidable position, defended by so many heavy cannon and manned by five times as many soldiers as the British could bring up against him, formed ample grounds to authorize such hopes and fill him with such convictions.

But at the last moment he had not sufficient patience to wait for the hated foe to immolate themselves in front of the grinning muzzles of his cannon, but on learning how far the British vanguard had pushed ahead of its supports, and its paucity of numbers as well, he resolved to attack it at once with overwhelming odds, roll it up and have done with it.

So he quitted his trenches and advanced on Khassassin in force during the night, hoping to catch General Graham napping, but that gallant commander slept with one eye open, weasel fashion, and his out pickets were too tried soldiers to sleep at all, so the sea-like murmur of the advancing Egyptians was challenged in three different places at once by the wasp-like "ping-ping-ping" of British rifles, and the out sentries retiring on the pickets the alarm spread like lightning, and within five minutes the infantry brigades were falling in at the double and the cavalry trumpets were sounding "boots and saddles."

By this time the Egyptains' shells were whistling into the British camp, fired point blank like cannon balls, and knocking over the red-coated infantry like nine-pins.

But before they had done much damage a battery of horse artillery ran their guns up to the top of a sand hill and began to give them cold iron in turn, so that for a little while it was "bowl devil, bowl baker," and when the British infantry deployed as steady as on parade and peppered the dusky foe with their Henri-Martinis, the seasoning was so hot that it seemed to turn their stomachs for fighting.

But hark to the screeching of the railway engines as they bring up long lines of open cars, all crowded with soldiery, to the support of their comrades, and behold away to the left the dark clouds of Egyptian cavalry sweeping across the plain with the evident resolve of outflanking the small British force, even if their further aim is not to drive every mother's son of them into the narrow Fresh Water Canal.

An aide-de-camp at this juncture galloped up to the First Dragoons and saluting the colonel, says tersely, as he points his drawn sword towards the advancing horse:

"The general looks to you to account for those fellows, I am sure I need say no more."

"Not a word, sir, to either me or my men," was the proud retort as the veteran drew his sword.

Its brandish in the air was sufficient signal for every trumpet to blow out, for every knee to grip the pigskin, for every foot to turn in and every heel to drop.

Obedient to each brazen sound the regiment formed by the troops, changed into serried squadrons and then advanced out into the plain at a rapid trot in a glittering column of squadrons at wheeling distance.

It was a grand sight to see a body of men so coolly advancing to engage a force that outnumbered them by at least five to one, and who were evidently the elite of the enemy's cavalry.

Then, suddenly, a fearful shell fire was opened upon them from a battery on the railway bank, and many a man and horse was rolled over.

But not the slightest apparent confusion in their ranks was occasioned thereby, and Pat Monaghan presumed on their long close intercourse to observe to Captain Donelly, whose horse's tail twitched the newly-made corporal's charger's nose,

"Bedad, an' this is a hard pounding, yer honor; but the laugh will be to them who pound the longest."

"Right, my brave fellow, and my heart pounds against my ribs more joyously than it has done for weeks, for he who has stolen my young wife leads that cavalry in person, and I will soon discover whether either his sword or his vaunted talisman can guard his life," responded Frank, as he looked back at Pat with flashing eyes and grinning teeth.

At this moment the gray-haired colonel shouted in clarion-like tones:

"Close up! Close up! At them like an iron wedge, my lads? Gallop! Ch-arge!"

A joyous ringing shout, a momentary flash of sword blades in the air, the neighing of the war horses rushing to the battle, the blare of trump, the clattering of empty sword scabbards and the jingling of chain bridals was succeeded the next instant by the shock of the charge (for, inspirited by their great leader's presence among them, the Moslem cavalry came to the scratch for once), and then steel rang on steel and horse bit at horse, and there was the horrid noise of cloven skulls and the thud of falling men, all intermingled with shrill British cheers, the demon-like Arab tecbir or battle cry, curses, shrieks and groans, and now and then a pistol shot, but, strange to say, this latter few and far between.

Amidst the tumultuous sea of swaying human forms and tossing horse's heads it was some little while before Frank Donelly could discover him whom he especially sought, but suddenly in the very thickest of the strife, he found himself face to face with him.

The recognition was mutual, and the next instant their blades were crossed.

Both had been previously whetted, and both Briton and Egyptian was full of the blood lust that is ever born of such deadly strife.

This, added to the private animosity that each bore unto the other, made them fierce indeed, and they attacked each other so furiously that sparks of fire flew from the tempered steel, and almost immediately they were engaged to the very hilt.

Both were superp swordsmen and each horse knew how to aid its rider by rear, demi-volt and curvet, but the Damascus steel had for once to succumb to the well forged Sheffield blade—for Damascus forging is not what it once was—and Arabi Pasha found himself all in a moment grasping little more than the hilt of his weapon, for nine-tenths of the blade had been whirled into the air.

There was no time to draw a pistol from his holster, for his rival's sword was at his throat, and there was death in that rival's eyes, if it was expressed by human orbs.

"Strike," gasped Arabi in French, "strike! Do I look as though I was afraid to die?"

For a moment longer Frank Donelly striking aspect of one who could not help hetbero, but then he suddenly lowered his sword point, at the same instant hissing between his teeth:

"Shall a Christian be outdone in generosity by a Moslem? Never. Retain your life, at whatever cost to me and mine. I cannot take it," and as though fearful that he might still be tempted to do otherwise, he wheeled his charger sharp round and galloped away.

But by this time the battle was nearly over. The Egyptian infantry were in full retreat and a second or two later the Egyptian cavalry also broke and fled, whilst the Irish dragoons, now reinforced by the swarthy Bombay cavalry, pursued them across the desert plain to almost under the guns of the Tel-el-Kebir batteries.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

From Thomas A. Kempis.

Lay not thy heart open to every one; but treat of thy affairs with the wise, and such as fear God.

We must have love toward all, but familiarity with all is not expedient.

Regard not much who is for thee, or who against thee; but give all thy thought and care to this, that God be with thee in every thing thou doest.

If thou canst be silent and suffer, without doubt thou shalt see that the Lord will help thee.

But if thou observe anything worthy of reproof, beware thou do not the same. And if at any time thou hast done it, labor quickly to amend thyself.

Few by sickness grow better and more reformed; so also they who wander much abroad, seldom thereby become holy.

Trust not to friends and kindred, neither do thou put off the care of thy soul's welfare till hereafter; for men will forget thee, sooner than thou art aware of.

It is better to look to it betime, and to send some good before thee, than to trust to other men's help.

O how wise and happy is he that now laboreth to be such a one in his life as he will desire to be found at the hour of death?

I have often heard that it is safer to hear and to take counsel than to give it.

It may also fall out, that a man's opinion may be good; but to refuse to yield to others when reason or a special cause requireth it, is a mark of pride and stiffness.

"Phil"

There were a bent and trembling old man—a white-haired and broken old woman, and as they sat beside the coffin the old man said:

"He was about ten years old. We found him in a basket on our door-step one night in the long ago. We were old people then, but wife she begged that we should take the little stranger in and care for him."

"Because my own children were sleeping under the sod," she explained as she wiped the tears away.

"So we made him our child," resumed the old man, "and in a little time we came to love him as if he had been born to us. He was a strange boy—quiet, gentle, thoughtful, sorrowful. There seemed to be a burden of grief weighing him down. He came to know in time—not from us, but from others—that he was no kin to us, and it troubled him much. Not that he did not love us, but that we were old and poor, and he felt himself a burden upon us. Last night a creditor came and abused us because we could not pay a debt. Little Phil had crept off to bed, but he must have been awake yet and heard every word. The man was angry because we could not pay, and he said something about our picking up paupers to feed and clothe. If it was his case, he said, he'd ship the boy off to the County House.'

"I went in to say good night to him," whispered the woman, "but he had his face to the wall and seemed to be asleep. We hoped he had not heard the harsh words, for we knew how they would wound him. Why, sir, if worst comes to worst, I'd have gone hungry to give that boy food. He was the bit of sunshine in our lives."

"In the morning when I got up," said the father, "I called to Phil, but he did not answer. I entered the room to find that he had put a rope over one of the clothes-hooks and strangled himself—committed suicide. He must have got up soon after we went to bed, for his body was cold and stiff."

"And—and he left this on the stand," sobbed the woman as she held out a note.

It was written on the leaf of an old memorandum book, and the writing was in pencil. It read:

"I no you wouldn't send me to the county house, but you are poore and in det. I'd go away if I could, but I doan't no where to go. Doan't feel bad. If God lets me into Heven I'll see you up there.—PHIL."

A Sleeping Car Incident.

In a sleeping car, just at the time when the seats were being turned into beds, I happened to be lazily eyeing a bridal couple on their honeymoon tour. How did I know? Because for an hour her head had been laying on his shoulder. Might they not have been married several years? No; her manner did not have the confident, proprietary air of an accustomed wife. Then why was I sure that they were not an enamoured pair, unjoined by wedlock? Because the girl was neither ashamed or defiant. Nobody ever makes a mistake in picking out honeymoon tourists. Therefore, the negro porter of the car astounded me when he said to the young husband:—"Wouldn't yo' sistah, sah, like to have her berth let down?" She lifted her head from the martial shoulder, smiled sweetly, and murmured, "Yes."

"This is my wife, you rascal," said the man, but with what seemed to me singular amiability; "you needn't make up the upper berth in this section. The lower one will be enough."

"Beg pardon, sah. Yes, sah;" and the porter went at the job with the kind of vim and alacrity never seen in a darkey who isn't sure of a special fee.

The incident puzzled me, and I sought an early opportunity to get the porter's explanation.

"It's dis way, boss," he said, "de brides don't like to be spotted. 'Course dey is ebery time, but dey flatter demselves dat dey can't be told from odder ladies. 'Sperience teaches me dat dey is tickled mightily of you mistakes dere husbands fo' brudders. I does it ebery time now, an' hits 'em fo' a dollah shuah."

The secret was plain once it was out. The gentle bride is delighted to think that her bridal fondness looks like sisterly affection and familiarity.

A South Sea Horror.

The latest horror from the South Seas is the roasting of two white men by the natives, who afterwards feasted on the remains. The information of the shocking affair has just been received from Brisbane, where it appears some fears were entertained of the safety of the cutter Alice Grey. The Alice Grey left Brisbane for McArthur river, in the northern territory. She was seen between Kimberly and Swear Island, after which nothing was heard of her. Whilst making inquiries to the fate of the vessel, the master of the schooner Pelton learned that the natives of the territory between the McArthur and Robinson rivers had murdered two white men. After killing the two men the natives were reported to have roast d the bodies and then feasted on them. It was supposed that the unfortunate men belonged to the crew of the Alice Grey; but before the report had reached Brisbane a dispatch was received from the Government Agent at Normington reporting the arrival of the Alice Grey. The two men were then thought to belong to another trading vessel.

Modern Proverbs.

In a multitude of counselors there is nothing done.

Where's there's a will, there's a way to break it.

Good deeds are never lost, if you have a good lawyer.

Honesty is its own reward; dishonesty pays cash.

Always put off until to-morrow any contemplated meanness.

Man proposes, woman accepts if the collaterals are good.

Marry in haste and escape a breach of promise suit.

Pay your debts, even if it makes you appear eccentric.

Have stability; a rolling stone gathers no moss.

Avoid stability; a setting hen never gets fat.

YOUNG FOLKS

"CHIP."

"Cheep! cheep!" Where did it come from—that plaintive little cry!

John heard it in the conservatory going out into the garden found a young bird, evidently too young to fly, and frightened at being left alone.

Kind-hearted John gathered the trembling creature up in his hands, and carried it into the warm conservatory and put it down under a fragrant lemon tree, and finding some cracker-crumbs in his pocket he soaked them in the watering-pot and strewed them before the birdling. But it was at first too frightened to touch them, but as John quietly resumed his work at a little distance at length began to pick up confidence, and soon was busily picking the crumbs with contented little chirps.

It had such a wide-awake, alert air as it grew comfortable and began smoothing its wisps of feathers in imitation of bigger birds, that John's honest heart warmed toward the little fellow and soon boy and bird became the best of friends. He called it "Chip," and when he tried to cage it, but gave it the whole conservatory for a play-ground, with which arrangement the little guest seemed perfectly satisfied, never trying to escape, even when the windows were open, probably not knowing the difference between clear open and transparent glass.

After the first day Chip never showed the slightest fear of John, alighting on his shoulder with perfect confidence, and after a little even taking food from his hand. As time passed he learned many amusing things, as, for instance, when John would say sternly, "Naughty Chip!" he would hang down his little head as if ashamed, and when John cried, pleasantly, "Good Chip! nice Chip!" would raise it again with a cheery "Peep!"

He had, too, a cunning way of playing hide-and-seek with John. Placing himself under the drooping leaf of a calla, where he would keep very still, while John walked up and down the terrace of plants, calling "Chip! Chip!" till at last with a queer little chuckling noise, he would dart into sight as delighted as a child. The people who employed John often sent visitors into the conservatory, and admired his pretty pet.

Once, a gentleman, whose only son was a little cripple, saw the cunning bird, and thinking it would amuse his poor child, asked John what he would take for it.

"I'm sure I don't know, sir," he answered, modestly. "I never thought of selling Chip, and I'm afraid he wouldn't be as happy anywhere else. You see he's used to me and knows I never hurt him in any way, that's why he is so tame."

"Yes," said the gentleman, looking thoughtfully at John, "I see—sometimes kindness will tame almost anything. Now will you let me take him home and try? I don't live far away, and if Chip will do as he does here I'll give you thirty dollars for him."

This seemed a great sum to John, who was poor, so he reluctantly consented, and for the first time putting Chip in a cage, the gentleman take him away; but not before released in the cripple's beautiful room, though there were almost as many birds as he had been used to, poor Chip only about with sharp cries of fright till he was tired out, then hid himself under a large leaf, where he sat in sulky silence, refusing to eat, and pecking at every hand that came near him

The next morning the gentleman came after John.

"It's as you feared," he said, "and worse than thur is no disappointed! Will you come and see what you can do with the little thing? Your master said you were all the world now."

Always glad to please others, John at once consented, and soon was in the sick house where so much sorrow dwelt, for the sweet mistress was dead and her husband hopeless invalid.

After he had spoken with the poor little child, John looked slowly about the room and made a peculiar sound with his lips, something between a whistle and a kiss.

The begonia leaf stirred. Here it came when there came from under it a very loud "Peep!" and out flew Chip, straight for John, where, almost hiding himself in the boy's coat collar, he fluttered and chirped around his neck in the funniest little ways of joy you ever saw!

At this the little lame boy laughed heartily that he had to lean back in his chair, while, looking up, John saw the happy tears spring to the father's eyes.

"It is the first time he has laughed in weeks," he explained to John, as, putting the now good-natured bird through all his tricks, he was about going on.

"John, I know you have a kindly way from the way you have tamed this wild creature. If your master will consent would you like to come and be a companion to Arthur—wheel him about, amuse him, read to him? You can read, John?"

"Oh, yes, sir," his eyes sparkling as he thought of the books he had peeped into at night, and the opportunity this would give him to read more; "and if my master is willing I'll gladly come."

So John and Chip went to the great house and both made the little cripple very happy, but when, in his mercy, God at length took Arthur home, John had become valuable as educated to be private secretary to the gentleman, so he remained as a great favorite ary.

And Chip? Alas, that I must tell it, a cruel cat ate him up! But we hope his end was sudden and painless, for he had well repaid his kind protector's care.

Celestials in British Columbia.

The Victorians have a very sharp way of dealing with the cheap labor difficulty. Every vessel is allowed to bring to port one Chinaman one John Chinaman for every hundred tons of its size. Consequently a ship of three hundred tons would only be allowed to carry fourteen of the heathen race. We have just seen in a file of Victorian papers that a vessel of that size was found to have fifty Chinamen on board, and the owner was muloted in a penalty of $500. Every Chinaman coming to Victoria has to take out papers of naturalization and pay a dollar tax. But the only Celestials that get naturalization papers to their heads are those of China, who come over with them, and so escape the tax.

Of late years many valuable products have been got out of coal-tar. Sir Lyon Playfair announced lately in Liverpool, that it has been discovered that a crystal can be extracted from it, an almost imperceptible amount of which will fully sweeten a considerable quantity of solid or liquid food, and that this new sweetener has the advantage over sugar of passing so rapidly away from the digestive organs, that it neither fattens those who take it nor encourages rheumatism. INVALIDS' HOTEL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE

No. 663 Main Street, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Not a Hospital, but a pleasant Remedial Home, organized with

A FULL STAFF OF EIGHTEEN PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS,

And exclusively devoted to the treatment of all Chronic Diseases.

This imposing Establishment was designed and erected to accommodate the large number of invalids who visit Buffalo from every State and Territory, as well as from many foreign lands, that they may avail themselves of the professional services of the Staff of skilled specialists in medicine and surgery that compose the Faculty of this widely-celebrated institution.

NOT ALWAYS NECESSARY TO SEE PATIENTS.

By our original system of diagnosis, we can treat many chronic diseases just as successfully without as with a personal consultation. While we are always glad to see our patients, and become acquainted with them, show them our institutions, and familiarize them with our system of treatment, yet we have not seen one person in five hundred whom we have cured. The perfect accuracy with which scientists are enabled to deduce the most minute particulars in their several departments, appears almost miraculous, if we view it in the light of the early ages. Take, for example, the electro-magnetic telegraph, the greatest invention of the age. Is it not a marvelous degree of accuracy which enables an operator to exactly locate a fracture in a submarine cable nearly three thousand miles long? Our venerable "clerk of the weather" has become so thoroughly familiar with the most wayward elements of nature that he can accurately predict their movements. He can sit in Washington and foretell what the weather will be in Florida or New York as well as if several hundred miles did not intervene between him and the places named. And so in all departments of modern science,

SIGNS OF DISEASE.

what is required is the knowledge of certain signs. From these scientists deduce accurate conclusions regardless of distance. So, also, in medical science, diseases have certain unmistakable signs, or symptoms, and by reason of this fact, we have been enabled to originate and perfect a system of determining, with the greatest accuracy, the nature of chronic diseases, without seeing and personally examining our patients. In recognizing diseases without a personal examination of the patient, we claim to possess no miraculous powers. We obtain our knowledge of the patient's disease by the practical application, to the practice of medicine, of well-established principles of modern science. And it is to the accuracy with which this system has endowed us that we owe our almost world-wide reputation of skillfully treating lingering or chronic affections. This system of practice, and the marvelous success which has been attained through it, demonstrate the fact that diseases display certain phenomena, which, being subjected to scientific analysis, furnish abundant and unmistakable data, to guide the judgment of the skillful practitioner aright in determining the nature of diseased conditions. The most ample resources for treating lingering or chronic diseases, and the greatest skill, are thus placed within the easy reach of every invalid, however distant he or she may reside from the physicians making the treatment of such affections a specialty. Full particulars of our original, scientific system of examining and treating patients at a distance are contained in "The People's Common Sense Medical Advisor." By R. V. Pierce, M. D. 1000 pages and over 300 colored and other illustrations. Sent, post-paid, for $1.50. Or write and describe your symptoms, inclosing ten cents in stamps, and a complete treatise, on your particular disease, will be sent you, with our terms for treatment and all particulars.

MARVELOUS SUCCESS.

OUR FIELD OF SUCCESS.

NASAL, THROAT AND LUNG DISEASES.

Recognizing the fact that no great institution dedicated exclusively to the treatment of chronic diseases, would meet the needs of the afflicted of our land, without the most perfect, complete and extensive provision for the most improved treatment of diseases of the air-passages and lungs, such as Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption, we have made this branch of our institution one of the leading Departments. We have every kind of useful instrument for examining the organs involved, such as rhinoscopes, laryngoscopes, stethoscopes, spirometers, etc., etc., as well as all of the most approved kinds of apparatus for the application of sprays, fumigations, atomizations, pulverizations, inhalations, and all other forms of approved medicinal applications.

We publish three separate books on Nasal, Throat and Lung diseases, viz.: A Treatise on Consumption, Laryngitis and Bronchitis; price, postpaid, ten cents; A treatise on Asthma, or Phthisic, giving new and successful treatment; price, postpaid, ten cents; A treatise on Chronic Nasal Catarrh, price, postpaid, two cents.

DISEASES OF DIGESTION.

Dyspepsia, "Liver Complaint," Obstinate Constipation, Chronic Diarrhea, Tape-worms, and kindred affections are among those chronic diseases in the successful treatment of which our specialists have attained unparalleled success. Many of the diseases affecting the liver and other organs contributing in their functions to the process of digestion, are very obscure, and are not infrequently mistaken by both laymen and physicians for other maladies, and treatment is employed directed to the removal of a disease which does not exist. Our Complete Treatise on diseases of the Digestive Organs will be sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in postage stamps.

KIDNEY DISEASES.

BRIGHT'S DISEASE, DIABETES, and kindred maladies, have been very largely treated, and cures effected in thousands of cases which had been pronounced beyond hope. The study and practice of chemical analysis and microscopical examination of the urine in our consideration of cases, with reference to correct diagnosis, in which our institution long ago became famous, has naturally led to a very extensive practice in diseases of the urinary organs. Our specialists have acquired, through a vast and varied experience, great expertness in determining the exact nature of each case, and, hence, have been successful in promptly adapting their remedies for the cure of each individual case.

The treatment of diseases of the urinary organs having constituted a prominent branch, or specialty, of our practice at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, and, being in constant receipt of numerous inquiries for a complete but concise work on the nature and curability of these maladies, we have published a large illustrated treatise on these diseases, which will be sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in postage stamps.

BLADDER DISEASES.

INFLAMMATION OF THE BLADDER, Gravel, Enlarged Prostate Gland, Retention of Urine, and kindred affections may be included among those in the cure of which our specialists have achieved marvelous success. These are fully treated of in our illustrated pamphlet on Urinary Diseases. It includes numerous testimonials from well-known people. Sent by mail for ten cents in stamps. Send for it at once.

STRICTURE.

STRICTURES AND URINARY FISTULÆ.—Hundreds of cases of the worst form of strictures, many of them greatly aggravated by the careless use of instruments in the hands of inexperienced physicians and surgeons, causing false passages, urinary fistulæ, and other complications, annually consult us for relief and cure. That no case of this class is too difficult for the skill of our specialists is proved by cures reported in our illustrated treatise on these maladies, to which we refer with pride. To intrust this class of cases to physicians of small experience, is a dangerous proceeding. Many a man has been ruined for life by so doing, while thousands annually lose their lives through unskillful treatment. Send particulars of your case and ten cents in postage stamps, for a large, illustrated treatise containing many testimonials.

NERVOUS DISEASES.

Epileptic Convulsions, or Fits, Paralysis, or Palsy, Locomotor Ataxia, St. Vitus's Dance, Insomnia, or inability to sleep, and threatened insanity, Nervous Debility, arising from overstudy, excesses, and other causes, and every variety of nervous affection, are treated by our specialists for these diseases with a measure of success heretofore regarded as impossible. See numerous cases reported in our different illustrated pamphlets on nervous diseases, any one of which will be sent for ten cents in postage stamps, when request for them is accompanied with a statement of a case for consultation, so that we may know which one of our Treatises to send.

DISEASES OF WOMEN.

So alarmingly prevalent are those chronic diseases peculiar to females, and so famous have our institutions become for their cure that we were long ago obliged to create a special department, thoroughly organized, and devoted exclusively to the treatment of these cases. The physicians and surgeons in this Department have made these delicate diseases their sole study.

Hundreds are brought to our institutions from far distant States on beds, and they go home well and strong. Every case consulting our specialists, whether by letter or in person, is given the most careful and considerate attention. Every important case (and we get few which have not already baffled the skill of all the home physicians) has the benefit of a full Council, composed of skilled specialists. Our Department and rooms for ladies in the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute are so arranged as to be very private, and free from the annoyances so common in other institutions. Send ten cents in postage stamps for our large Complete Treatise on Diseases of Women, illustrated with numerous wood-cuts and colored plates.

PILE TUMORS.

PILES, FISTULA IN ANO, and other diseases affecting the region of the lower bowel, are largely treated, and with marvelous success, by specialists, who give their whole time to the study and treatment of this class of affections. We never fail to cure pile tumors, however large. When the patient can come here for treatment, we will guarantee a cure.

Fortunately for suffering humanity, a method of treatment has been perfected and thoroughly tested in our institutions, by which in from six to fifteen days radical and perfect cures of the worst forms of piles are effected without causing any severe suffering. Send ten cents in stamps for our large illustrated Treatise on Piles.

RUPTURE.

Hernia (Breach), or Rupture, no matter of how long standing, of what size, or what the age of the patient may be (if not under four years), is speedily and radically cured in every case undertaken by our specialists, without the knife, without dependence upon trusses, without pain, and without danger.

THROW AWAY TRUSSES.

There is no longer any need of wearing clumsy, awkward, chafing, old trusses, which, at best, give only partial relief, which never cure, but often inflict great injury and induce inflammation and strangulation, from which thousands annually die.

NOT SAFE.

There is no safety in depending upon any kind of truss, though, no doubt, every man who has suffered the agonies of a strangulated hernia, and died, thought himself safe. Both the rupture and the truss keep up a mental strain and induce nervous debility and various organic weaknesses of the kidneys, bladder, and associate organs.

CURES GUARANTEED in every case undertaken. Can any sufferer ask for greater inducements than these?

Notwithstanding the great number of ruptures treated in the three years past, many of them of immense size and of such a character that no other plan of treatment could possibly have succeeded, every case to which this perfected system of treatment has been thoroughly applied, has been perfectly cured. Only a few days residence at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute is necessary.

Abundant references, by permission of those whom we have cured, will be furnished to any one wishing to call upon or write them.

An illustrated treatise on Rupture sent to any address upon receipt of ten cents.

DELICATE DISEASES.

Organic weakness, nervous debility, premature decline of the manly powers, involuntary vital losses, and kindred affections, are speedily, thoroughly and permanently cured.

To those acquainted with our institutions it is hardly necessary to say that the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, with the branch establishment located at No. 3 New Oxford Street, London, England, have, for many years, enjoyed the distinction of being the most largely patronized and widely celebrated institutions in the world for the treatment and cure of those affections which arise from youthful indiscretions and pernicious, solitary practices.

We, many years ago, established a special Department for the treatment of these diseases, under the management of some of the most skillful physicians and surgeons on our Staff, in order that all who apply to us might receive all the advantages of a full Council of the most experienced medical men.

WE OFFER NO APOLOGY.

We offer no apology for devoting so much attention to this neglected class of diseases, believing no condition of humanity is too wretched to merit the sympathy and best services of the noble profession to which we belong. Many who suffer from these terrible diseases contract them innocently. Why any medical man intent on doing good, and alleviating suffering, should shun such cases, we cannot imagine. Why any one should consider it otherwise than most honorable to cure the worst cases of these diseases, we cannot understand; and yet of all the other maladies which afflict mankind there are probably none about which physicians in general practice know so little.

We fully agree with the celebrated Dr. Bartholow, who says, "I think it a reproach to our profession that this subject has been permitted, in a measure by our own indifference, to pass into the hands of unscrupulous pretenders. Because the subject is disagreeable, competent physicians are loath to be concerned with it. The same unnecessary fastidiousness causes the treatment of this malady to be avoided in private practice."

We shall, therefore, continue, as heretofore, to treat with our best consideration, sympathy, and skill, all applicants who are suffering from any of these delicate diseases.

Our Complete and Illustrated Treatise on these subjects is sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in stamps.

ALL CHRONIC DISEASES A SPECIALTY.—Although we have, in the preceding paragraphs, made mention of some of the special ailments to which particular attention is given by the specialists at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, yet the institution abounds in skill, facilities, and apparatus for the successful treatment of every form of chronic ailment, whether requiring for its cure medical or surgical means.

Local and Other Items.

NOTICES in these columns intended to benefit any individual or Society will be charged ten cents a line for the first insertion and five cents a line each subsequent insertion.

ALF. MOFFAT went to Toronto on Tuesday to the hospital to have his eyes treated.

OUR stores all close at 7 sharp except on Saturday evenings, commencing last Monday.

SCORES of fishing poles might be seen moving towards the Saugeen last Saturday morning, shortly after sunrise, the 1st May.

MR. H. J. Glassford will travel this season in this district a fine young imported Clydesdale Stallion. He is a very promising three year-old.

"Kiss the baby when you can," admonishes a new poet. "We would prefer them at sweet sixteen, provided they are the right kind;" so says our foreman.

THE management of the Canadian Pacific Railway contemplate opening the all rail route to British Columbia, for passenger and freight traffic, on or about Queen's Birthday.

THE Ladies' Aid Society of the Methodist church are making vigorous preparations for their annual Bazaar and Concert on the "Queen's Birthday," of which due notice will be given later.

MR. JOSEPH HAWKEN, of Euphrasia, has just learned that he was a great-grand-father on the 17th April. His great-grand-daughter lives in Dundas. Mr. H. is quite a hearty man of some 50 summers.

LECTURE.—Rev. Mr. Casson will give a lecture on Wednesday evening next, 12th, in the Methodist church: subject. "The British Empire." Doors open at 7.30 o'clock; lecture at 8. Admission, 15 cents.

A GRIST MILL BURNED.—R. McGowan's fine brick grist mill at Priceville was totally destroyed by fire on Saturday night. The loss is estimated $10,000; partially insured. The cause of the fire is supposed to be from a pulley in connection with the chopper.

AUCTION SALE.—J. W. Shore will sell by public auction on his premises, lot 127, second east of T. & S. Road, Artemesia, on Tuesday next, 11th inst., a number of horses, young cattle, sheep, implements, &c. Terms 7 months on approved paper. Geo. Noble, auctioneer.

IT is not often we are favored with a lecture on the "British Empire," and seldom do we meet one who can handle the subject equal to Rev. Mr. Casson; thorough knowledge of history coupled with a remarkable fine memory and rare fluency on the platform are a sufficient guarantee that the lecture will be a rare treat.

Every effort is being made, under the management of an able and enterprising committee, to celebrate the "Queen's Birthday" in this village in a right royal manner. A long list of cash prizes will be awarded, but we are not yet in a position to say for what. Will give particulars next week.

Christ Church Ladies' Aid Society will give a grand concert in Haskett's Hall on Tuesday evening, 11th May, when a quintet string band from Owen Sound, Mr. Jakeway, a popular reciter of Stayner, and Mrs. Moore of Shelburne will entertain the audience. Doors open at 7.30. Admission, 25c.

IT was rumored on Tuesday last that an accident happened Mr. Samuel Douglas, of Euphrasia, while in Owen Sound that day; we were pleased, however, to see him the following day, hale and hearty, not apparently any the worse. He has concluded at all events that "Two is better far than one, &c."

"How does my wife take my nacriceration?" asked a convicted Mormon of a brother. "Susie cries her eyes out; Jennie is sad at times; Martha don't seem to care very much; Sophie says she is going back to her parents in Tennessee, while Eugenia is already engaged again." "Ah, my wife is a wonderful woman, isn't she?"

MR. JENKINS, of the Chronicle, takes strong exceptions to an item in the STANDARD, viz., that he is bringing himself out as a candidate for M. P. at the coming general election. He goes on in his customary ungentlemanly and insinuating style of retort. We have yet to be convinced that he (Mr. Jenkins) is not thrusting himself upon the party. He says that "the leading Conservatives of South Grey voluntarily admitted that Jenkins was the strongest man if he got the convention." Just so; we would not be at all surprised that the man who gets the convention will be the strongest man; but, to presume that a person of such degraded habits as the editor of the Chronicle was likely to get the convention would not, in our opinion, be creditable to the moral status of the Conservatives of South Grey.

LARGE SHIPMENT OF CATTLE.—Mr. M. Dunn, of Calgary, N. W. T., shipped. on Saturday last, 520 head of cattle, comprising 500 two-year-old heifers and 20 two-year-old thoroughbred Short Horn Bulls. 300 of the above were shipped from Markdale, 120 from Dundalk and 100 from Guelph. Mr. Dunn has an extensive range for breeding purposes near Calgary, having taken from Ontario, previous to this shipment. 1,500 head, and will require 1,000 more the present season, which he expects to take in other two instalments. This drove when arriving at Calgary will stand him about $16,000, or an average of about $32.00 each. He has been in the business a great many years, and thoroughly understands it, and from what we can learn, is very honorable in his dealings with the public.

A DOUBLE BENEFIT.

Harry Ricardo, of Toronto, certifies to the benefits received from the use of Hagyard's Yellow Oil as a cure for rhumatism and deafness, his affliction with these combined troubles being a severe one.

DROWNED.—A very sad case of drowning took place at Allenford, in Mr. D. Pooter's mill dam on Friday last. The victim was Mr. Thomas Greenslade, a farmer living near that place, who was rafting some logs across the pond to get them sawn. He stepped on the outer edge of the board which held the logs together, and the end went down throwing him into the water which was of considerable depth. He only came to the surface once, and not being able to swim, he went down to rise no more alive. It was about half an hour before the body was recovered, and life was of course, extinct. His father stood on the shore but could render no assistance in time to save his son's life. Deceased was 45 years of age and very highly respected.—[Wiarton Echo.

THE latest remedy for Coughs, Colds, Croup, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, etc., is McGregor's Lung Compound. There is no remedy in existence containing any one of the active ingredients composing McGregor's Lung Compound, so do not say you have taken everything until you have tried this for your cold or cough, and your opinion will be the same as all who have used it, viz., that it is the best. Sold in 50c. and $1.00 bottles by R. L. Stephen, Druggist, Markdale. 1

A MODERN MIRACLE.

In a recent letter from R. W. Dowson, of Deloraine, Ont., he states that he has recovered from the worst form of dyspepsia, after suffering for fifteen years; and when a council of doctors pronounced him incurable he tried Burdock Blood Bitters, six bottles of which restored his health.

Be Loyal.

Be patriotic! Stand by your home institutions like men. What builds up a place from a hamlet to a village, from a village to a town, from a town to a city? Does dissension, strife, jealousy? No! Does dealing at home when you want credit of the business man and going elsewhere when you have the cash to spend? No! Does finding fault with what others do instead of putting out your hand and giving a lift? Does defaming your town in order to take vengeance upon some one who works for the good of the town and reaps his reward, while you are appraised at your true value—less than nothing? Is it not the true way to show your manliness, your patriotism, your loyalty by being a man in every respect, a citizen on every occasion? No town can prosper where its inhabitants are at daggers drawn, any more than can a family when the members of it are quarrelsome and indifferent to the general good of the home. Be loyal to your town—try to make it the best place you have ever seen—buy all you need in it, and always have a good word to say for it to everyone you meet.—[Thornbury News.—The above is true and to the point, ED. S.]

A SEVERE TRIAL.

Those who endure the torturing pangs of neuralgia, rhumatism, sciatica, lumbago, and similar painful complaints are severely tried, but there is a speedy relief in Hagyard's Yellow Oil as thousands who have used it joyfully testify. It banishes pain and lameness quickly.

A PLEASING DUTY.

"I feel it my duty to say," writes John Borton, of Desert P. Q., "that Burdock Blood Bitters cured my wife of liver complaint, from which she had been a chronic sufferer. Her distressing, painful symptoms soon gave way, and I can highly recommend the medicine to all suffering as she did."

ONE DOLLAR AGAINST FIVE HUNDRED.

Isaac Brown, of Bothwell, Ont., was afflicted with chronic humors in the blood. He says a one doller bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters was worth more than $500.00 paid for other medicines. It is a reliable blood prifier.

HOUSEHOLD.

Little Perplexities.

A housekeeper who takes a sensible view of the minor trials of a woman's life, writes the following for this column:

Why cannot the housekeeper feel that her position is a noble one, and act accordingly? Why does she so many times look upon herself as a drudge? "Women are Statesmen" oftimes in their management of affairs, even in the kitchen of a farm-house; and if they would look upon themselves as such, even when weary and carewern, they would be happy.

It is not the large matters of the household that worry the woman as much as the little perplexities of every day life; the washing, ironing, churning and baking are all expected, and pass smoothly along, but the dust and dirt often make the woman long to pitch things out at the window, as did Thoreau, to get rid of dusting. But what need of fretting? After one has come to years of maturity, she knows that life is full of little trials, and she must prepare to meet them pleasantly. When I first kept house I thought the meals must be eaten the moment they were placed upon the table; but I find there are worse things to be met than a cool baked potato. I find it is the woman's place to have the meal ready at the usual time, and if the men-folks are behind time, say nothing and they will not.

And another thing, I find it an excellent plan to keep busy when waiting for the men to come in, instead of running about doing nothing but wonder why they don't come; you can wash the cooking utensils you have used getting dinner, the fry-pan, potato kettle, etc.; then you can do the work up quicker after dinner. Whenever about the cooking you are done with a dish, fill it with water whereby a minute or two may be saved in washing it. Keep calm and cool when hindered so that when dinner is at last served you may not be a "roasted lady" as Charles Lamb tells about, served with every course, but may make up by your pleasant manner and witty remarks any deficiency that waiting may have made to show in the food.

It frets a woman less to have dinner wait a few moments than to have the men wait for dinner. The latter stand round and hardly know what to do or say until the welcome voice calls them to the table. Have a paper, book or magazine at hand, and if you are getting fretted and nervous, go to reading and forget for a few moments your trouble. This is a curious world and we must learn to make the best of it and take all the comfort we can if we are farmer's wives.

Breakfast Bills of Fare.

BREAKFAST NO 3.

Codfish in cream. Pop-overs.
Dry Toast.
Coffee.

CURDLED EGGS.—Pour boiling water on to fresh eggs and remove the dish containing them to the back part of the stove where the water will keep warm and let them remain ten or twelve minutes. The white of the eggs will then be cooked uniformly with the yelk, and the whole will be superior in flavor and digestibility to an egg which has been boiled.

CODFISH IN CREAM.—Pick up into small pieces, fish that has been soaked in cold water over night. Heat milk or cream boiling hot and add the fish with a spoonful of flour that has been mixed smooth with a little cold milk. As soon as it boils up, break a fresh egg into it and stir just long enough to cook the egg and then remove it at once from the fire.

POP-OVERS.—One cup of flour, one cup of milk, one egg, a piece of butter the size of an egg, and melted, and a pinch of salt. Bake in gem pans. Make the mixture perfectly smooth and free from lumps, by adding the milk very slowly to the flour, and stirring constantly. Beat the eggs and add last. Have the pans hot and buttered, and fill them half full of the mixture, then set directly into a quick oven. Fifteen minutes will bake them, and they will justify the name by rising far above the limits of the pan. The secret of having pop-overs just right, is to have everything all ready before you begin, and then make quick work of the mixing and baking. These are also sometimes called egg muffins.

BREAKFAST NO. 4.

Dropped Eggs.
Frizzled Beef. Baked Potatoes.
Cold Graham Bread.
Coffee.

DROPPED EGGS.—Have a frying pan filled with boiling water slightly salted. Lay in muffin rings and into each turn an egg which had previously been broken into a cup. As soon as the white is set they are done. Cooked in this manner they are not broken in pieces as when dropped into the water without the rings.

Frizzled Beef.—Have the dried or smoked beef shaved very thin, place in a stew-pan with enough water to cover it; and when it boils add a spoonful of flour made smooth in a little cold water. As soon as it thickens add a generous piece of butter, a little pepper, and turn into a hot dish.

GRAHAM BREAD.—Make a batter at night of one pint of milk or water, one pint of flour, and one-half cup of yeast. In the morning add one pint of Graham, one-half cup of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt, beating it in thoroughly. Turn it into two pans. It will be a little slower in rising than white bread.

Ghastly Discovery.

The other day a ghastly discovery was made about five miles below Clarksville, Tenn., by two boys. A hogshead, which had been left in a field by the late receding waters of the Cumberland, was found to contain the mutilated and much decomposed bodies of a man and a woman, supposed to be negroes. The arms of the male were separated from the body, while both bodies had apparently been sawed in two. The skulls of both were missing. The popular belief is that the bodies are subjects from the medical college at Nashville.

A Scotch dominie, after relating to his scholars the story of Ananias and Sapphira, asked them "why God did not strike everybody dead who told a lie." After a long silence, one little fellow got to his feet and exclaimed: "Because, sir, there wadna be anybody left."

PUTTING THE FALLS TO WORK.

A Scheme to Use the Power of Niagara to Run Mill Wheels.

As a burlesque upon Yankee ingenuity, it used to be said in the comic papers that Uncle Sam would some day put a wheel under Niagara Falls and run all the machinery in the country. Ridiculous as this seemed, Yankee ingenuity has devised something very like it, and a bill to put the scheme into practice has recently passed both Houses of the Legislature.

The bill says that the company is formed for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating, in connection with the Niagara River, a hydraulic tunnel, or subterranean sewer, for the public use of sewerage and drainage and for furnishing hydraulic power for manufacturing purposes in the town of Niagara. The capital stock is to be $200 000 at first, with the right of increase to $3,000,000.

The plan is a simple one. A great pipe or shaft is to be cut through the rock close by and parallel with the Niagara River, 160 feet deep and running half a mile or more back from the falls. The open end of this little shaft or tunnel is to empty out of the rock at the falls a few feet or two above the level of the water below the cascade.

Whenever a company wants water power it may sink a vertical shaft from the surface almost down to this horizontal shaft. In the bottom of this vertical shaft a turbine wheel is to be placed, and below this a smaller shaft, for a tail race, will carry the water from the wheel to the great horizontal shaft, which will then work as a waste pipe to carry off the water. In order to get the needed water to drive the wheel it will only be necessary to build out a short pier on the river shore to catch the edge of the swiftly flowing current and divert a little of it, by means of a ditch or pipe, into the vertical shaft, and so past the wheel and through the great subterranean shaft and back into the river again below the falls. These vertical shafts are to be big enough to admit one or two of the workmen, who must place the turbine in position and afterward attend to it. It is said that a wheel as big as a man's hat will supply 200 horse power, though this was said carelessly by the reporter's informant, who acknowledged uncertainty as to the precise amount.

The plan is to sell to manufacturing corporations the right to sink shafts as close together as practicable along the line of the great waste shaft. A glorious success is prophesied for the company. It is said that cheap, steady, reliable power is so great an item in manufactures that a committee of Connecticut mill owners declared that it would pay them to remove their mills and factories to the town of Niagara. Freshets, droughts, and ice play mischief with those interests that depend on water power throughout New England, but no such annoyance, it is said, attends the use of Niagara water power. The Niagara never freezes, never overflows, and never runs dry.

PEN PICTURE OF PASTEUR.

How the Inoculation Apostle Appears in Every Day Life.

Pasteur, the lion of the day, is, like Mr. Gravy, a Franche Comtoise. He has the intonation in speaking of the President of the Republic—that is to say, he drawls slightly and emphasizes strongly the leading words in each sentence. There is an indolence in the walk which arises from an incompletely cured attack of hemiplegia, from which some years ago he was dangerously ill. He manages not to limp, although he has to drag the left leg, which is not of so much use to him as a cork one set on an active thigh. The eyes of yellowish brown, with less brown than yellow of a topaz hue, are set in blatrous lids, and appear too much fatigued to see without first being well rubbed. I dare say they are what they look. There are vertical wrinkles in the brow and queer unnatural crow's feet about the temple. Concentrating attention through a microscope on the infinitely small animalcular world has produced them. Pasteur's countenance betokens originality; and the whole man shews sturdy strength and grit. He must be kind as he is unaffected. The outer man is short, thick-set, deep-chested and a massive head is set close to a pair of broad shoulders. The face is fat though not glabre (you have no English word I think for glabre), and the beard, which is short, scant and grizzled, does not certainly adorn it. I like the spoonbill nose. It shews character and intensifies the homliness which keeps company with his air of intelligence, and which shews freedom from small conceit. But if Pasteur is not self-sufficient and self-conscious, he is not without quiet dogmatism of manner, such as one finds in old French country cures who have long been looked up to by their flock. The servant of the Rue d'Ulm is genuine, but he means to turn the altar of science to good account, and has for many years turned it to good account in procuring an income for himself. The homely kindness is devoid of sensibility. It costs him no pang to immolate dogs, rabbits and guinea-pigs on the altar aforesaid.

The Poisonous Lizard of the Pacific Slope.

At San Francisco some one had caught a large heloderma and had tied it to a post, and there was usually a crowd about it. Among the lookers on was a drunken fellow, who was amusing himself by stirring up the reptile and telling the crowd that he did not believe that it was poisonous. Some of the men took him away several times, but at last he began to call everybody cowards, in drunken fashion, and before any one could stop him he thrust his hand into the animal's mouth and was severely bitten. I never saw a man sobered so quickly in my life. In a short time he began to feel sharp pains in his arm, and before long it began to swell, and he was obliged to lie down. He was sobered completely, and though they poured all the liquor down his throat that he would take, it had no effect upon him. Some one started for a doctor that lived ten or twelve miles away, but the man died where he fell, right in the street in the middle of the town, surrounded by a crowd of as white-faced men as you want to see. He went into convulsions. It was a terrible sight. As soon as he became conscious he would beg some one to shoot him, and some were in favor of it, but the majority ruled, and he died from the poison in less than an hour after he was bitten.

SPRING SMILES.

Somebody makes the remark that the most disagreeable month to a soldier is a long March. It May be, but when a soldier has been 'October by a bullet once or twice he changes his mind.

Customer (in restaurant)—"Here, waiter, this steak is too tough to eat." Waiter—"Sorry, sah; Ise too busy to argue 'bout dat steak now. If yo' wan's to argue wif a waiter 'bout de roughness eb steak, yo' mus' come in when de noon rush is ober."

A woman may be as homely as a drove of camels, and as uninteresting as a counterfeit detector, but as soon as her husband is elected to Parliament, and they take up their residence in Ottawa and give receptions, she becomes "handsome and fascinating"—in the newspaper. There are no blanks.

A colored child had a fall from a second story window, the other day, and his mother, in relating the accident at the grocery-store, said: "Dere dat chile was a comin' down feet fust, wid every chance of bein' killed, when de Lawd he turned him ober, de chile struck on his head, and dere wasn't so much as a button off."

Cremation is evidently making headway. If ridicule could have killed this method of disposing of the dead it would have succumbed to the cartoon printed some years ago, depicting a small boy with a tin can in his hand standing at the door of a crematory and asking of the proprietor, "Please, sir, is dad done yet?'

"I'se got a complaint ter make," said Jim Webster to his employer, a merchant. "What is it?" "De book keeper kicked me." "Of course he kicked you. You don't expect me to attend to everything, do you? I can't look after all the little details of the business myself."

Hall's Journal of Health says "intense thirst is satiated by wading in water." Here is an idea theatrical-managers should immediately act upon. Let them provide a pool of water in their respective houses of amusement, for the benefit of young men whose intense thirst drives them out between acts. Managers should spare no expense to cater to the wants of their patrons.

Members of the Shakespeare class (reading)—"The sixth age shifts into the lean and slippered pantaleon——" Another member (a young woman of hot air culture)—"I would suggest, ladies, that 'pantaleon' the word 'trousers' be substituted as less objectionable and more in harmony with the present age." This suggestion was unanimously adopted.

Miss Cynthia Mushroom—"Now, pa, do be careful at dinner and don't mortify us before Mr. Stuyvesant Sturtevant." Mrs. M.—"Yes, Phineas, do mind your manners, and remember your instructions about etiquette." Mr. M.—"Well, that's all right; you kin go ahead, and arrange things to suit yourself, but I'm hanged if I'll eat pie with a fork for anybody."

If you are unlucky enough to break a cherished fan or a paper knife, put it together carefully so that the break won't show, and leave it lying on the parlor table. Some guest is sure to pick it up, and when it falls in two pieces, if you preserve a discreet silence regarding the former mishap, he may think he broke it, and be induced to get you a new one.

"I wish I were yon star," he said dreamily. "So do I," she returned promptly, heroically swallowing a yawn. "And why, dear one?" he asked impulsively, "why do you wish I were yon brilliant orb?" "Because," she replied in cold, matter-of-fact Bostonese tones, "because yon brilliant orb is just 11,760,971 miles away." And he faded silently out like mist before a Summer sun.

The other evening, at a concert, a long-haired pianist was punishing the instrument with epileptic gestures, and evolving what was supposed to be descriptive music. An old lady went into ecstasies of admiration. "How fine!" she exclaimed; "one can hear the roar of the cannon; the town has been taken by assault; they are fighting in the streets; the soldiers are already giving themselves up to pillage—the——" "Oh!" sighed a neighbor, "if the soldiers could only carry off the piano!"

An Eastern man, who was travelling in the Southwest, came across the railroad which was paying many of its employes, less than seventy-five cents per day, and he enquired why they did not strike. "Only makes matters worse," was the reply. "But how could it?" "Well, we tried it when we were getting ninety cents a day, and the president got up together and made such a speech against labor grinding the life out of capital that we hired back to the company at seventy-three. We ain't the sort of fellows to get at it and squeeze the life blood out of a corporation paying its president only $25,000 a year."

"My dear," said Mrs. Snaggs to her husband this morning, "I don't think I know your friend Mr. Pott, do I?" "Pott?" asked Mr. Snagg in surprise. "Yes, Mr. John Pott." "John Pott? I don't know anybody of that name." "Oh, you surely must know him very well, for you talked about him in your sleep last night, and called him Jack as though you had known him all your life." "Jack Pott! Ah, I must have been dreaming about a schoolmate of my boyhood days. I had almost forgotten him." And Snaggs went down town cogitating on what a narrow escape he had.

Tact is the lubricant that makes sliding down the baluster of life easy. She had two adorners, and, as is usual, halted between two opinions. Harry loved her well, but George's head was the longest, as the sequel shows. "Speaking of memories," cried Lucille, "why I can remember when I used to play with dells and make mud-pies in the lane." "What a wonderful memory!" exclaimed the foolish Harry, admiringly. "Pshaw! Wonderful to recall that which occurred so few years ago?" spoke George of the long head, and the next time Harry spoke to her she snubbed him.

CHAPTER LIX.

THE HOUR OF HER SUPREME TRIAL—HOW WILL IT END?

Let us return once more to Nellie within the gilded bars of her harem prison.

As more and more days passed the enthusiasm of the Cairo population seemed to increase. There was one little window, closely latticed, from which she could obtain just a peep, a diminutive bird's-eye view, of the outer world, and at this window she was never tired of standing.

From it she could see some of the old glittering European shops, now closed and barred with great planks of wood across their fronts. From it, in the failing light of evening, she sometimes saw picturesque Arabs squatting in every conceivable attitude on the sidewalks, with curve of hate upon their lips and upon their frowning brows as they doubtless discussed in all its bearing some lying bulletin from the front, and more than once in the deepest hours of the night the rush of hurrying feet, the shrieking clamour of human voices and the red lurid glow of torches would cause her to rush thither, when as likely as not she would behold some hapless murdered European carried along on a cluster of pike or spear heads, with a rain of blood dropping on the bearers, whilst the surrounding crowd poured forth their hate in every curse and epithet that the Arabic vocabulary is capable of, and whilst casting every manner of abomination at the stripped and often cruelly gashed body of the dead, which was as often that of a woman or an innocent little child as of a strong and stalwart man.

It was impossible, whilst witnessing sights such as these, for Nellie not to feel thankful that her parents and herself were housed as they were, or not to be aware that at the very least, all three owed their lives to the war minister, so that it was only when she came to remember the price that she, individually, would have to pay for that protection that she shuddered.

The settling day could not for long be postponed, she felt sure, and she never doubted but that the Egyptian army, in its overwhelming numbers, was again and again beating the mere handful of men that foolhardy English ministers always think sufficient to overcome an Oriental or African foe, forgetting how modern rifles and ordnance equalize the strength of contending soldiery by rendering a quick eye of far greater account than a strong arm.

When we are anticipating the terrible or the unwelcome time sometimes seems to fly and sometimes to creep, and so it was with Nellie. At last, however, late one evening, the Vallde Khanoum came rushing into her little room in a state of great excitement and exclaimed:

"He has arrived! Ahmed is at home! He insists on seeing you immediately."

"Oh, I cannot see him to-night. Can you not tell him that I am gone to bed?"

"He will not take that as an excuse, and—and—I dare not urge it as one. For the first time in my life I am afraid of him. I would not refuse him a thing for the world. I suppose his blood is still hot with the fighting and the victories he has won."

Nellie glanced at the elder wife and saw that she was deathly pale, and trembling as well.

Such a sight was not at all calculated to soothe or encourage her, but rather to impress her with the dread that something dreadful was at hand, she dared not think what.

Acting instinctively, as it were, she raised the mosquite curtains, sprang from off her cotton-stuffed mattress and began to hurriedly dress herself.

She was not yet presentable, consonant with Europeans ideas of modesty, when heavy steps, accompanied by the clatter of a sword scabbard and the silvery ring of spurs, became audible without, announcing the unwelcome fact that the man who deemed himself her husband had grown tired of waiting the return of his messenger and was coming to seek her in person.

"Oh, don't let him come in!" gasped Nellie. "Keep him out for a little while. Oh, what shall I do?"

"My dear, your shoes are not outside the door. If they were, he would not dare to enter."

"But a word from you would keep him out. Oh, do beseech him not to come in yet."

"I would not cross his will this night for worlds. He looks as though he had the evil eye."

And it was evident, from the way in which the woman trembled, that she was really alarmed

But Nellie's terror was ten times greater, and her agitation made all her fingers thumbs, so the common saying is, so that she could neither clasp nor fasten anything properly that she was putting on.

At this juncture the footsteps had arrived just outside her curtain door, but the next instant her fears were allayed, if not entirely dissipated, by a calm voice saying:

"Directly you are ready to receive me, but not before, I wish to speak a few words to you. Do not be alarmed, little one. I come to you as a friend, nothing more," and hardly were the words uttered when the heavy footsteps were heard receding again. It was very strange.

But not less reassuring than strange, and Nellie's fingers lost their awkwardness and became deft and eager enough. The Vallde Khaneum was now able to help her too.

"The dark fit has passed away, I suppose," she remarked. "He spoke gently to you, at all events, and I say this for our lord and master, that when he is gentle with one he is usually so with all. But I felt sure just now that an evil eye had been cast on him."

"I am quite ready now," said Nellie suddenly. "Let us go out and meet him."

"Would you sooner that he came in here?"

"Yes; certainly, my kind friend."

So the two women, or rather the woman and the girl, raised the curtain and issued forth into the vestibule, the further end of which Arabi Pasha was pacing to and fro with the quick, eager steps of a tiger in a menagerie as feeding time approaches.

"The dark hour is still on him I fear," whispered the Valide Khanoum as they approached. "Speak to him gently, my dear. Do not venture to oppose his slightest wish whilst he is thus."

Nellie did not answer, for she felt that she could not promise to follow advice.

By this time the war minister heard the soft fall of approaching footsteps, and wheeling sharp round he advanced to meet the two women.

As he moved near to them the lamps of perfumed oil that were hung here and there against the wall showed how deadly pale he was and how strange a light gleamed in his eyes. On his white face there was a spot or two of blood.

"Gaziala, leave us," he said in peremptory tones. But he hastened to add in softer accents: "For awhile only. I will come to you presently."

The Valide Khanoum answered meekly: "As you will, Ahmed. My lord's will is his slave's life," and dropping her companion arm, she hurried away as fast as she could.

Nellie could plainly hear her heart beating when her sole friend and protectress had gone, and Arabi Pasha, noticing her trepidation, seized her both hands, and grasping them in his looked earnestly into her face, whilst he exclaimed in almost tearful accents:

"Why do you tremble so, little white dove? Is it because you pant to be free and so quit the ark which has been your safe refuge for so long a while?"

"The ark may be a safe refuge when the floods are out, but the wild bird prefers the green weeds and liberty," responded Nellie faintly, in the same figurative language.

"Why don't you add 'to return to its own mate in its proper nest and no longer to consort with the fierce kite. Do you not regard me as some such vile bird of prey?"

"Indeed, no. I have never had an ill opinion of you. Far from it."

"Then you do not in your heart make me responsible for all the crimes and calamities that have attended this great national movement and for the frequent shedding of innocent blood."

"God forbid that I should do so. All risings of the people against tyranny, in every country and in every age, have been characterized by such crimes and excesses on the part of the more cruel of the population, but the leaders of such movements have never been answerable therefor." Here she came to a full stop, dreading what he would next say.

"I thank you. I sincerely thank you for this, your good opinion of me. Possessed of it I can defy that of all the world beside. But I am not yet quite satisfied. Tell me candidly how do you think that I have treated you. Do you consider that I have used you very badly?"

"If you will but treat me as well in the future as you have done in the past I shall have little reason to complain; aye, and I will daily bless you for your merciful forbearance."

At this point Nellie would have sank on her knees before him had he but permitted her.

"Do you know, little white dove, that I begin to think the daily blessings and prayers of one so lovely, so innocent and so pure would be a richer prize that even her adorable face and person if unfreely given. When I made you my wife I thought that I could also soon make you very happy and teach to forget the Feringhee youth to whom your parents told me you were not married. I might have done so had Allah seen good to make me what, for my country's sake and yours, I yearned to be. But that dream has forever past away; and so, though you are at this moment more absolutely in my power than ever you were in my pavillon at Hafr Dawar, and in my opinion every bit as much my wife, I will prove to you that the despised Egyptian can be generous and merciful, for I will give you freely up unto him you love. Farewell, little one and forget not your promise, for from this moment you will never see me more."

"Oh, this is good! this is brave! this is noble and magnanimous indeed!" cried Nellie, feeling hysterically joyful, but struggling hard not to show it. "I cannot speak my thanks, for words could not express my gratitude and hearts, unhappily, are dumb."

"Happily, say rather, for had they the gift of speech they would lose their intensity of feeling. Yet, would to God that mine at this moment could find relief in speech, for then it would not be so likely to break. Think not that you are wholly responsible for my grief, for dearly as I have loved you I have loved my unhappy country even more, and now she is lost indeed. The crimes of your countrymen have riveted her chains stronger than ever, for victory has been theirs in every engagement, and in an hour they will be here and I their prisoner. But it is all as Allah wills, so praised be the name of Allah. I can at least say that."

"But can you not escape? Surely there is yet time," suggested Nellie, anxiously.

"My friends and companions in this great venture are already taken and I would share their fate," answered the war minister. "I go from hence to deliver myself up, and I go quickly, for I would not be suspected of trying to hide myself like a cowardly jackal. You and your parents had better remain here until your countrymen occupy the city in force, for not until then will it be safe for you to venture forth. I have still an hour to give to the good wife who has been fond and true to me for so many years, and who is the mother of my brave boy. So farewell once more and may God have you in his keeping."

And quickly raising one after the other of Nellie's hands to his lips, he kissed and dropped them and with a deep sigh, then took a hurried departure, whilst she whom he had thus abruptly quitted retreated to her room in tears, for it was impossible not to feel sorry for one who had behaved so nobly to her.

CHAPTER LX.

THE CAMPAIGN OF THE SPUR—THE FALL OF THE CURTAIN.

The march from the Suez Canal to Cairo deserved to be called the Lightning Campaign, for with three pitched battles and a dozen skirmishes its accomplishment took but a fortnight and a day.

Twenty-four hours after the scenes recorded in our last chapter but one Sir Garnet Wolseley made the midnight his ally, and under cover of "Egyptian darkness" led his little army within rushing distance of the Egyptian general's stronghold, taking Tel-el-Kebir in fifteen minutes by the clock, and with the bayonet only, a rare feat against rifled cannon.

Directly the "impregnable" Tel-el-Kebir had collapsed like a burst balloon, it was the campaign of the spur and the sabre once again, and Major General Sir Drury Lowe followed up the success by a splendid dash forward with the cavalry, thereby preventing the enemy from rallying in the direction of the capital.

The Irish Dragoon Guards led the van, and entered with such ardor into the pursuit that they soon distanced both the English and the Indian cavalry, and though men and horses were faint with hunger, parched with thirst, and troopers not unfrequently dropping out of their saddles from the effect of sunstroke, they pushed on and on until a distant view of the domes and minarets of the great Mosque of Mehemet Ali, rising above the rocks of the Citadel, drew an enthusiastic cheer from the ranks.

Captain Donelly had the honor of commanding the advance squadron of this brilliant vanguard, and though his little force consisted of but a hundred and forty-five men, and he knew that there were ten thousand Egyptian soldiers in the capital, and most probably by then the commander-in-chief as well, he hesitated not to enter the city with blast of trumpet and brattle of kettledrum, and before another hour had elapsed, in obedience to his summons to the officer commanding the citadel to surrender immediately, eight thousand Egyptian soldiers laid down their arms and filed out before him as prisoners of war; the most extraordinary occurrence ever recorded in history. An unexaggerated fact. Captain Darley was the real name of the Irish officer in charge.

The populace at first looked sullen and resentful, but no sooner did the blast of more trumpets announce the rapid approach of larger bodies of the foe than they grew civil and even cringing, and when at length the main body of the regiment came spurring in through the Gate of Victory, closely followed by the ferocious looking Indian contingent, with their long lances swaying like a forest of lofty pines before the strength of a gale, than they burst out into loud shouts for the Khedive, so that one would have fancied that that highly unpopular prince had always been idolized by them and been in very fact the father of his people.

These cheers, in which Tewfik's name was always loudly called, so as to prevent the slightest possibility of misconception, assailed Arabi Pasha's ears almost continuously as he rode through the crowded streets to surrender himself up to the first British officer whom he might chance to meet.

It must have been a bitter sound to one who a short month, aye, even in a little less degree a short week ago, was the chosen of the people and the idol of the nation to hear a despot restored by foreign arms thus greeted and proclaimed, while his own progress through the streets called not forth one single cheer of commiseration.

Some even hissed the fallen hero who had sacrificed all that he possessed for their sakes, and it is very possible that worse indignities ere long might have been offered to him had he not suddenly come across a British cavalry patrol, which, as he observed that it was under the command of an officer, he at once approached.

He was within a half a dozen yards of the little party of red coats before he perceived who that officer was, but it was too late to retreat ere he was recognized in turn, not first of all by Captain Donelly, but by Corporal Patrick Menaghan.

"Bedad, yer honor, an' here comes Herrible Pasha eager to make friends at last."

This was Pat's way of putting it, but no sooner did our hero recognise his discomfited rival than he saluted him courteously with his drawn sword, and then spurred forward to meet him, his handsome face full of unconscious commiseration the while.

"Captain Donelly, I would perhaps sooner that it was any one else, but what is to be will be, and at all events I could not surrender my sword to a braver man," said the war minister, as he tendered his sheathed weapon.

But the generous young Irishman hastily deprecated the movement, saying: "No, no not to me; not to me; but allow me to conduct your excellency to the quarters of Major General Sir Drury Lowe, who, I am sure, will accept your surrender on parole and refuse to accept from you a weapon which he will feel, though he may not perhaps say it, that you neither drew without reason nor sheathed without honor." Then he motioned to his men to surround their prisoner.

Arabi Pasha seemed to be much affected by this courteous speech.

"Thank you," said he; "your words have blunted the keen edges of your countrymen's weapons. They have lightened my heart also, and furthermore made me wish to lighten yours in turn. As soon as your duties allow, go straight to my house (palace it was called in the days of my prosperity, but no matter, for palace or house, any one will point it out to you if you do not know it already), and therein you will find one who still in every way deserves your love and who with little effort has made a better man of me after, by great efforts, I had failed to make a worse woman of her. Take her again to your heart, well assured that she richly merits all the love that an honorable and proud man can bestow on her."

* * * * * * *

Is there any need for assuring the reader that Frank Donelly followed this advice as soon as ever he had delivered Arabi Pasha over to General Sir Drury Lowe?

Attended only by Corporal Monaghan (whose sergeantcy loomed in the near distance for many acts of personal gallantry that he had performed during the campaign, and which would almost to a certainty give him the bronze cross of honor as well) he rode through the streets to the war minister's late abode, and on reaching it entered it without any invitation, the color of his coat being under the circumstances of the case quite sufficient passport.

He was too delicate minded, however, to seek to pass behind the harem curtain in like manner, and so merely signifying to the aga of eunuchs what he wanted, and that she had better be brought to him safe and uninjured or that his life should answer for the consequences.

The threat was amply sufficient and the jet black Soudan negro salaamed and disappeared, returning in less than five minutes with Nellie walking beside him.

Who shall describe the rapture of that meeting, wherein the husband and wife who had been separated almost as it were on the steps of the altar met again after a lapse of so many weeks, every one of which had been so full of perils to each of them?

So oblivious were they of their surroundings that Pat Menaghan felt himself called upon to keep a very close watch on the aga eunuchs lest he should play them some dirty trick or other with his scimetar or pistols, of which he seemed to be quite capable.

While the three were thus employed there came the sudden rustle of silk skirts and Mrs. Trezarr hove into view like an old-fashioned line of battle ship under full sail.

"Here comes the bitters after the sweets—the nasty physic after the lump of sugar, instead of before it," thought Pat Monaghan to himself.

But for once the shrewd Irishman was mistaken, for instead of resembling a bitter astringent Mrs. Trezarr was as sweet as molasses and thanked Frank Donelly so unctiously for his "rescue and preservation of them all," that he felt sure he was an accepted son in-law at once; while the hearty and genial greeting of Mr. Trezarr, when he just as suddenly turned up from another direction, converted the decided impression into a positive conviction.

"You will protect the inmates of this house where I have been so kindly treated by one and all from any chance of insult or injury, won't you, Frank?" pleaded Nellie, anxiously.

"Certainly, my love, though they have only such a thing to fear from their own countrymen and most decidedly not from British soldiers. Yet, nevertheless, I will place half a dozen of ours to guard the house, and I'm sure such a precaution will meet with the approval of the general."

So, when Nellie had bidden a grateful and affectionate adieu to the Valide Khanoum and assured her that no harm could happen to her or to any of the other ladies, and that her husband was safe under the protection of one of the British generals and could not be surrendered up to the revengeful Khedive without a guarantee from that prince that he should be fairly dealt with (which items of information she had previously obtained from Frank), the party of five made an immediate move from the war minister's palace to Shepherd's Hotel, which was already open and doing a brisk business, and there, over champagne and other welcome refreshments, the Trezarr pere and mere did the "Bless you, my children," business with an amount of gush and protestation that would have been highly comical and slightly disgusting had it not chanced to be also most particularly welcome, for such a father and mother-in-law could be patiently borne with for a short while for the sake of so beautiful and darling a bride.

A few lines more will conclude our tale.

There is no need for us to enter minutely into events that have become matters of history. How the Sultan of Turkey played with the hare and ran with the hounds, and so lost the respect of all parties, is too well known to be commented on here; as well as that the Khedive Tewfik would have had his fallen rival murdered in secret, on the principle that dead men tell no tales, had not Great Britain taken the greatest care that such an act of barbarity and injustice should not be perpetrated.

But the tales that were told as a consequence of this convinced the English government, when too late, that they had made a most egregious mistake in interfering with Arabi at all and had been beguiled into mistaking a great national uprising and heroic struggle for freedom for a mere military rebellion conducted and set on foot by three ambitious colonels.

As for the Princess Zeeneh, the Khedive's sister, her fate is a mystery. She has never been heard of since the fall of her secret lover and affianced husband. She worked in the dark on his behalf like a noxious and venemous spider, and she is by now either buried alive behind the harem curtain or lying dead in the narrow prison house of the grave.

The sole token that she has left behind for the world to see and wonder and puzzle over is a bracelet exhibited in the window of the most famed goldsmith in Paris—a bracelet made from pure virgin gold sent by her to him along with the desire in which it was to be wrought, and in which the names of Arabi and Zeeneh are worked into a clever cipher on the inside of the ornament, whilst the outside is embossed with scenes emblematic of her lover's anticipated triumph and her brother's hoped for defeat and fall. Strange sentiments for a sister.

Major Donelly and his fair young wife now reside on the former's estate in Ireland, whilst Sergeant-Major Menaghan has quitted the army to become his butler.

THE END.

Work for the Humane.

The American Humane Association directs the attention of the public to the barbarities and abuses continually being practiced in various portions of the country, and oftentimes in localities and cities which are deemed very highly civilized. In order that the friends of the defenceless and helpless may know the extent of this evil, and devise measures for their relief, mention is here made of some of the

EXISTING CRUELTIES:

Animals in freezing and starving condition, in exposed localities on the Western plains, in the winter season.

Animals so horribly burned on their bodies, through careless branding, as to make wounds that never heal.

Animals severely wounded and tortured by clubs and long, sharp iron preds, when being loaded on stock-cars.

Animals so cruelly crowded, trampled, starved, and kept without water, when transported long distances by rail to market, as to make their meat unfit for food.

Horses compelled to endure excruciating torture by the over-check and other high check-reins, through the ignorance and pride of thoughtless drivers.

Dogs and cats driven to desperation and madness from want of water.

Horses ruined in health and limb through being over-loaded, lack of food and improper feeding.

Old, galled, cripled horses ill-fed, overloaded, and generally abused by hard masters.

Cows compelled, through the penuriousness of their owners, to run the streets, in many cities and villages, quenching thirst from mud-puddles, pounded by clubs, beaten by stones, and mutilated by dogs, when driven from yards into which the animals force themselves because of hunger.

Calves with feet tied and tortured, while being transported long distances, in distressed condition, over rough roads, by butchers and others.

Fine horses, outrageously high-checked and brutally over-driven by drunken, careless and cruel drivers.

Pigeons wantonly wounded, mutilated and allowed to linger hours before death comes to their relief, at shooting tournaments.

Horses left standing in exposed conditions, through severe storms, without covering.

Beautiful song and useful birds needlessly slaughtered by men and boys for sport.

Insects, birds and animals of various kinds cruelly put to death by thoughtless persons, when a little care would make death less painful.

The cruelty and savage insect aroused by pugilism, cock and dog-fighting.

The useless, barbarous cruelty inflicted on hares and foxes in allowing them to be chased and hunted by hounds for hours, as sport.

The debasing, cruel effect on children by close confinement at labor, often in dark and unwholesome factories and other places.

The cruelties and beatings inflicted on patient, uncomplaining wives by brutal and drunken husbands.

The whippings and abuse endured by boys and girls who have been given into the charge of coarse and hard masters.

The starvation and neglect endured by infants and small children, when left by their parents with those who promise to care for them.

The privation, distress and degradation of little waifs of children, in the streets, who often have no one to protect them.

The deplorable condition of the horse, no longer useful, turned loose to starve and die; the child, whipped by the heartless parent; the discharged prisoner, whom no one will employ; the little tired cash-boy and cash-girl, that should have been, hours ago, in bed; the haggard, sunken-eyed, poorly paid sewing-woman; the starving family, that can get no work; and many, many others not here mentioned.

"Sawing By."

There are many problems connected with the running of a single track railroad. One of these is how to get two trains past one another when each is longer than the side track. The means by which this is accomplished is known as "sawing by." There was a time when this plan was not so familiar as it is now, and the following clipping from the "Chicago News" shows how a young brakeman turned his ingenuity to good account.

A number of years ago a stubby young man with a big mouth and solid-looking head was taken on the Galesburg division of the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad as a freight brakeman. He seemed to pay no attention to the sports indulged in by his fellow-brakemen when off duty, but spent most of his time around the shops learning how to run engines and picking up information about the machinery of railroading. One day a tall, clerical-looking man was riding in the caboose of the train on which the young man was employed. The tall man seemed to take a kindly interest in the young brakeman, who answered his questions courteously, but did not permit the passenger to interfere in the least with his duty. Finally the train came to a stand-still, and it was found that it had met another freight train at a station where the side track was not long enough to hold either train. The problem presented was: How were the trains to get by each other? In this day that would be solved very easily but it so happened that at that time, when railroading was a very different matter, neither conductor had encountered such a condition of affairs, and both supposed that one of the trains would have to back up to a station with a longer side track. As the conductors were discussing this the tall passenger and the young brakeman came up to them.

When the young man understood the situation he said to his conductor, respectfully.

"You can get by."

"How, I'd like to know?" said the conductor.

The young brakeman picked up a stick and marked out in the mud what is now known to every railroad man as "sawing by." The trains were sawed and went their way. The next day the young man was called to the division superintendent's office, where he met the tall passenger—Superintendent H. H. Hitchcock—and was taken into his more immediate employ, where he learned telegraphy and became a train despatcher. In a short time the office of master of transportation was created, and the young man was given that place. From that day he has grown rapidly, and now the man who rides over the Chicago and Alton Railroad on the general manager's pass reads that young brakeman's name at the foot of it—C. H. Chappell, general manager.

Lemon juice and salt will remove ordinary iron rust. If the hands are stained there is nothing that will remove the stains so well as lemon. Cut a lemon in half and apply the cut surface as if it were soap.

THAT SINK HOLE.

It appears strange that nothing can be done in the shape of a permanent job on what is known as "Allen's sink hole."

It is now over four weeks since it was passable for a foot person, while it is dangerous for a team to cross, especially for strangers. The water has been very high in that swamp this season, and covers the road, more or less, for forty rod, causing great inconvenience to the travelling public.

If there is a possibility of draining it, the council should have it done, as that appears to be the most likely mode of surmounting the difficulty. This place has been swallowing public funds for the last twenty years, and its appetite appears to be increasing.

If some person would advance a scheme that would make a permanent job at a reasonable cost, they should get a pension, at all events the council should look after it promptly.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

The annual spring show held in Flesherton on the 29th ult, was well patronized. It is evident from the show of stallions in the ring that a deep interest is being taken in the importation of new and well bred stock into the county.

A. Munshaw, Esq., is making marked improvements on the commodious hotel, by raising the walls with two feet of brick work and covering with a new roof of much steeper pitch than that of the old.

Operations have already commenced upon the foundation of the new Baptist church, to be erected here this summer. Messrs. Moore and Whitton have secured the contract for the same.

REMOVALS.—J. G. Russell, our popular jeweller, moved this week into the house recently purchased by Thos. Osborn from J. G. Brooks. Mr. Brooks moves into his own new dwelling erected by himself this season. Rev. J. Watson moves into the dwelling vacated by Mr. Russell.

The Baptist people of this place have changed their hour of service from 11 a. m. till two p. m., and have commenced a Sunday evening service in the Orange Hall at Flesherton station.

There was no preaching in the Presbyterian church here on Sabbath last.

The fourth regular quarterly meeting services for the present ecclesastical year was held in the Methodist church here on Sabbath last. The services of the day were felt to be a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. In the morning the pastor, the Rev. Mr. Ayers, announced a praise and thanksgiving service for the evening. There was a large turn out, the church being filled to the doors. The service was commenced by the choir singing the Lord's Prayer. Several anthems were rendered by the full choir during the service. Miss Addie Armstrong sang a solo in fine voice with good effect. Rev. Mr. Ayers gave a brief address, in which he spoke of his happy relation with his church and congregation during this, his first year with them. During the year he had received nothing but the most marked kindness, sympathy and help from all. There was good cause for thanksgiving and praise on part of both pastor and people. He and they could rejoice that during the year souls had been made happy by coming to the Saviour. Numerically as a church they had been strengthened, and spiritually, they had also been blessed. His earnest prayer to God was that they all might go on from strength to strength until glory should crown what grace had begun. Mr. M. Richardson was then called upon and gave a most happy thrilling address on the service of song and its effects; spoke on the duty, privilege and enjoyment of praise with several incidents illustrative of what he was then speaking of. Dr. Christoe then followed, and spoke of the influence of religion and its concomitant spirit of praise on character and how it shed a halo round its possessor at the close of life, as witnessed often by himself in his professional duties. Several appropriate hymns were sung by the congregation, and the whole service was one of delight and enjoyment to all present.

STEEL ROAD SCRAPER.

I beg to call the attention of Municipal Councils and others to my new Solid Steel Road Scraper—One Solid Plate of Steel Pressed into Shape. The weak point with steel bottom scrapers has been overcome in this case by putting on Steel Shoes which protect the bottom, so that there is no more wear on it than on any other part. The Scraper combines Lightness with Strength, and Handiness with Durability, and will scrape any ordinary ground without ploughing. They gave good satisfaction to all who used them last Season.

HEALTH.

Corpulence and How to Reduce It.

Prof. Ebstein's work on the treatment of corpulence has been translated by Dr. E. W. Heeber of New York. To those who are anxious to reduce their advoirdupois by a regular system we commend the following lines:

After laying much stress upon the importance of careful adaptation of the system to the individual case, so that the decrease in corpulence shall be gradual and never so rapid as to in any degree weaken the forces of the patient, the author recommends:

"The diet must consist of three meals, breakfast, with tea or coffee—but this without milk or sugar—dinner and supper. The dinner is the most important meal. Nothing should be taken between breakfast and dinner. Supper must be comparatively light. With dinner the patient may take one or two glasses of light wine, white or red; beer is to be avoided, unless the hydro-carbons are proportionately reduced, and then only a very small quantity can be allowed."

Here is a sample bill of fare by which a patient was reduced "twenty pounds in three quarters of a year," which to people in a hurry about it may seem to be somewhat slow and suggest memories of the charity boy, who, having learned the alphabet, doubted "whether it was worth while to go through so much to learn so little":

"(1) Breakfast, one large cup of black tea, without milk or sugar; about two ounces of white or brown bread, and plenty of butter. Time, in summer, 6:30; in winter, 7:30 a. m. (2) Dinner (about 2 p. m.), soup, with bone marrow occasionally, four to six ounces of meat, boiled or roasted, with fat gravy, especially of fat meat, plenty of vegetables, cabbage, and most of all legumes (peas and beans). Beets, carrots, and turnips were on account of the sugar they contain almost totally excluded, potatoes entirely. After dinner a little fresh fruit, occasionally some salad or stewed fruit, but without sugar. To this was added two or three glasses of white wine. Soon after dinner a large cup of black tea, again without sugar or milk. (3) supper, (between 7 and 8 p. m.), in winter regularly, and in summer occasionally, another large cup of tea, without any sugar or milk; one egg or some small plate of fat meat, or both, or some ham, with its fat, sausage, smoked or fresh fish, two ounces of white bread, with plenty of butter, and occasionally a little cheese and a little fresh fruit."

There does not seem to be much deprivation and hardship about that—to one who has never tried it. Ebstein, it will be observed, allows a liberal quantity of fluids with meals. In this respect he is vigorously opposed by other scientific theorists. Dr Schweninger, for instance, absolutely forbids the drinking of anything at meals, or within two and a half hours afterward, and requires that at all times the quantity of fluid taken shall be the least possible.

Curative Powers of Water.

There is probably no single article in the world which possesses such curative powers as water. If it cost a dollar a pint, and had to be brought a thousand miles, physicians would no doubt prescribe it, and people would be anxious to purchase it. But it is, perhaps, too cheap and convenient to come into general use. About three quarters of every human body is warm water, and the presence or absence of this fluid in due proportion has more to do with health than almost any other condition of our existence. A man can live upon water three or four times as long as he can upon dry food; in fact, nothing is fit for food unless it contains a large percentage of water. And for a large proportion of the diseases from which men suffer, water is the most prompt and efficient remedy. In cases of croup, colic, neuralgia, congestion, sore throat or rheumatism, there is probably nothing which will so promptly relieve distress and dangerous symptoms as pure hot water. In fevers nature cries out for water with unutterable desire; and it is often the only remedy which can satisfy and relieve the sufferer.

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

The amount of coal in the Pittsburg region is estimated by Professor Lesley, of the Pennsylvania Geological Survey, at 30,000,000,000 tons. About 11,000,000 tons are now taken annually from the bed, of which two thirds are bituminous coal and one-third anthracite. Professor Lesley believes that the oil and gas supply will practically cease ten or twenty years hence.

It is announced that Messrs, Appert of Clichy, France, have discovered a process that will make glass blowing by the mouth unnecessary. Many attempts have been made to get rid of this painful process in the operations of glass-making, but to this day in every bottle house may be seen pale-faced men with their cheeks hanging limp in folds, the result of years of glass-blowing by the mouth. Cases have been known in which men's cheeks have been worn so thin that they have actually cracked, and it is a common sight in a bottle house to see blowers at work with their thin cheeks puffed out like the fingers of a glove.

The two comets that are approaching the earth are coming at a tremendous rate—as comets will—and promise to be objects of great brilliancy. Professor H. A. Newton, of the Yale Observatory, thinks they will be brightest about May 1, and will show well in the Northwestern sky. The one discovered by the French observer, Fabry, will come relatively very near—within a distance of only 15,000,000 miles, or but a little more than one-half the distance of the planet Venus. It is not yet certain that both comets will be visible at the same time in the same quarter of the heavens, but it is possible that that unusual spectacle may occur.

NELSON'S PROTEGE.

The Wonderful Career of Edward Lee.

It was a bright morning in Spring, and the English fleet lay at anchor in Portsmouth harbor, awaiting the admiral's signal to start out on a cruise. The flagship, a huge, formidable ship of the line, with its dark sides bristling with guns, was all in commotion. The admiral, the most famous sailor of his day, was ready to recieve him. Already the guns of the squadron were beginning to thunder forth their welcome, and soon the vessel was wreathed in smoke, and quivering beneath the discharges of her heavy ordnance, as Admiral Nelson touched her deck, surrounded by a brilliant staff. Standing near the edge of the quarter-deck, and watching the scene with intense eagerness, was a young lad of about eighteen. He was dressed simply but neatly, and his cheeks glowed, and his eyes kindled, as he watched the exciting events that were going on around him. As he returned the salutes of the officers, the admiral chanced to observe the lad.

"Who is this?" he asked, turning to the captain of the vessel.

"He's a young lad that came on board a few hours ago," replied the captain. "He insists on seeing you, sir, as he says he has something of importance to say to you."

"Well, my lad," said the admiral kindly, "speak out freely."

"If you please, sir," said the boy, "I've come to ask you to take me to sea with you."

"Is that all you have to say, you young scamp?" asked the captain, sharply.

"Let him alone," said the admiral, laughing. "What position do you want?" he asked, turning to the boy.

"If you would take me as your cabin boy, sir," said the lad, "I should be very glad."

"That's a poor chance for you, if you wish to rise above it," said the admiral, kindly.

"It will be a beginning," replied the lad. "If you'll give me a start, I'll work my way up, sir. You did it; and I mean to do so, too."

The admiral gazed at him kindly but searchingly, and then said, with a smile, "I'll take you with me on this cruise; and if you want to rise, I'll give you a chance. What is your name?"

"Edward Lee," was the reply.

"Very well, then, Edward, I take you into my service," said the admiral. "I shall expect you to prove yourself worthy of the trust."

"I'll do it, sir," said the boy, earnestly, as he moved aside, respectfully, to let the admiral pass.

In two hours the Vanguard stood out to sea, followed by the squadron, to join Earl St. Vincent at Gibraltar. The young valet of the admiral made a decidedly favorable impression upon the officers of the ship before the completion of the voyage.

"'Tis too bad," said the admiral to his flag-captain one day, "that that boy should fill a menial's position."

The captain agreed with his commander, and the result of the matter was that, a few days after the arrival of the Vanguard at Gibralter, Edward Lee was given a midshipman's warrant by Earl St. Vincent, at the special request of Admiral Nelson.

Then came the famous cruise in the Mediterranean, in search of Bonaparte and his fleet. In the terrific gale which dismasted the admiral's ship, young Lee proved that he merited the kindness his great commander had shown him, and won praise from all on board. Then came the brief halt at Syracuse, the arrival of the wished-for reinforcements, and the departure for Egypt. As the dawn of the memorable first of August revealed to the eyes of the English the tricolor floating over Alexandria, and the French fleet in the bay of Aboukir, Edward Lee was standing by his chief on the deck of the flagship.

"There they are," burst from a score of voices, as the distant vessels came in view.

"Yes," muttered the boy; "and we'll be there, too, before night."

Nelson glanced at him approvingly.

"There's a chance for promotion for us all in there," he said, smiling.

He was right. The fearful encounter which carried such sorrow and despair to so many English homes, brought to these two men fame and honor. Through the whole action the admiral's eye was on the young "middy," and all through that long and thrilling Summer night it never lost the gleam of satisfaction which had illumined it as he heard the young sailor's words in the morning. The same dispatch that greeted him as Lord Nelson informed him that his request for a lieutenancy for young Lee was granted.

Steady devotion to his profession, and conspicuous bravery in times of danger, soon made the youthful lieutenant a noted man in His Majesty's navy. The battle of the Baltic was a memorable day to him. It was truly the greatest battle he had been in. Though severely wounded, he refused to go below, and stood at his post until the close of the action. When Sir Hyde Parker gave the signal for discontinuing the fight Lieutenant Lee reported it to Lord Nelson. The admiral, putting the glass to his blind eye, said, with mock gravity, "I really don't see the signal. Keep our flag for closer battle still flying. That's the way I answer such signals. Nail mine to the mast."

It seemed that the fortunes of the great admiral and his protege were mysteriously united, for this victory, which made the one a viscount, made the other a first lieutenant, though he had just come of age. He followed his commander, who had become warmly attached to him, through all the years that intervened, so that, when the great day of Trafalgar came, he was the second in command to Captain Hardy. As the action began, Lord Nelson approached him, and, placing his hand on his shoulder, said, "We are going to have a hard day, Edward. I hope you may pass through it safely."

"I shall try to do my duty, my lord," said Lieutenant Lee. "But," he added, pointing to the uniform and decorations which the commander wore, contrary to his custom, "why does your lordship render yourself so conspicuous to day? You will surely draw upon you the fire of some marksman."

"I have a presentiment," said the admiral, "that my race is run; so I have put on all my harness to-day. In honor I gained them," he exclaimed, proudly laying his hand on the insignia, "and in honor I will die with them."

The presentiment was realized. It was the last action of the great sailor. As he fell on the deck, in the heat of the battle, the captain and lieutenant of the ship sprang to him, in an agony of grief.

"Go back to your post, Edward," he said, as the lieutenant knelt by him. Then he added, gently, "God bless you, lad."

With a sad heart the young man returned to his place. The fate which had seemed to unite his destiny with that of his commander was fully realized on this day, for, just as the victory was gained, a heavy discharge of grape from a French ship of the line swept the deck of Lord Nelson's ship; and when the smoke cleared away, Captain Hardy saw his lieutenant lying almost in the same spot where the conqueror of the Nile had fallen, with his breast torn open by the terrible discharge.

She Required no Further Explanation.

At a rent dinner on one of their estates the Duke and Duchess of M——happened to be present, when a son of the soil appeared in a state of great excitement. The duchess, inquiring the cause of his distress, was told that, having come a long distance, he had lost the rent on the way, but if agreeable to them he would go back and look for it. A few days after he appeared with the lost money. The duchess asked him where he found it, and was answered in the following rather singular manner:

"Well, you see, on my way I stopped at the Banrigh stables to speak to a friend. I took out my pocketbook to gie him a letter and must have dropped the money, for this is hoo I found it. Supposing his grace was the stables and your grace the manure an' I was the rent. Weel, you see—"

"Yes, yes," interrupted her grace, quickly; "that will do. I perfectly understand the whole affair."

IMPORTANT TO DAKOTA SETTLERS.

Land Commissioner Sparks' Famous Order of April 3 Revoked by Secretary Lamar.—Honest Settlers Not to be Made to Suffer Because of a Few Disreputable Characters.—Reported Resignation or Removal of Sparks.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The text of the order of revocation and a history of the order of April 3 were laid before each member of the cabinet at yesterday's meeting. The language of the order of revocation was approved as it stands. It is said that if any evasion of the order is attempted, Mr. Sparks will be called on to resign.

TEXT OF THE ORDER.

Following is the full text of the order of revocation:

Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C, April 6.—To the Commissioner of the General Land Office:—Sir: On April 3, 1885, you issued the following order:

Practice, Suspension of Entries—Final action in this office upon all entries of the public land, except private cash entries and such scrip locations as are not dependent upon acts of settlement and cultivation, is suspended in the following localities, viz: All west of the first guide meridian west in Kansas; all west of range 17 west in Nebraska; the whole of Colorado, except land in the late Ute reservations; all of Dakota, Idaho, Utah, Washington, New Mexico, Montana, Wyoming and Nevada; and that portion of Minnesota north of the indemnity limits of the Northern Pacific railroad and east of the indemnity limits of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad. In addition, final action in this office will be suspended upon all timber entries under the act of June 3, 1878, also upon all cases of desert land entries.

[Signed.] W. A. J. SPARKS, Commissioner.

Whatever necessity may have existed at the time of its promulgation has ceased to be sufficient to longer continue an order suspending all actions, and involving in a common condemnation the innocent and the guilty, the honest and the dishonest. While I earnestly urge the exercise of the strictest vigilance to prevent by all the agencies within our power, the consummation of fraudulent or wrongful land claims, yet, when the vigilance of all these agencies shows no substantial evidence of fraud or wrong, honest claims should not be delayed or their consideration refused on general reports or rumors. The above order as issued by you is therefore revoked, and you will proceed in the regular orderly and lawful consideration and dispesal of the claims suspended by it. Very respectfully, [Signed.] L. Q. C. LAMAR, Sec'y.

He Fired on Time.

They engaged a new porter at a Lafayette Hotel. Everybody liked him, he was so cheerful, so obliging, and so rigorously and scrupulously exact in carrying out every order given him. The other day Mr. J. B. Johnson, the vice-president of the Omaha Chilled Plough Works, put up at the hotel. Mr. Johnson is a very dignified and polished gentleman, and extremely particular about his room and service. That evening a very extraordinary thing occurred. Some say it was about 9 o'clock, others place it as late as 10½. At any rate, somewhere near that time Mr. Johnson was amazed to see the door of his room open and a man step in.

"Who the dickens are you?" asked Mr. Johnson.

"Oi am the porter," replied the stranger, deliberately removing his coat and rolling up his sleeves.

"Well, what is the meaning of this singular intrusion?" inquired Mr. Johnson.

Thomas did not reply. He spit upon his hands, executed a rapid and fantastic jig, and leaped suddenly upon the astonished guest.

"Help! Murder!" bellowed Mr. Johnson; "crazy man killing me,"

"Shut up, ye dhirty spalpeen!" exclaimed Thomas, obtaining a firm grip upon the bust of his trousers, and propelling him rapidly out of the room, "its none of the loikes of ye that is wanted in a dacent house."

"But, my good man!" gasped Mr. Johnson, his words coming by excited jerks, "there is some mistake. Let me explain!"

"Niver a word, ye hoodlum!" replied Thomas, rushing him toward the stairs; "we're on to ye The house has had ye spotted!"

The next instant the guests in the corridor were amazed to see two figures, one spluttering and kicking and the other grim and determined, scoot down the staircase, plunge through the lobby, and disappear into the outer darkness. In a few moments Thomas returned, panting and rolling down his sleeves.

"What in the name of heaven were you doing?" asked Mr. Weekly, the proprietor, when he recovered sufficiently from the shock to speak.

"I was firing that dhirty blackguard Johnson," replied Thomas.

"Firing him? Hold me, somebody? What put such an infernal idea into your head?"

"Here she is," replied Thomas, with an injured air, holding the slate before the proprietor's eyes.

"By—the—great—horn spoon," gasped Mr. Weekly, and swooned away.

This was what he read:

"No. 40; fire at 10:30."

The Carrier-Pigeon.

The carrier, the acknowledged king of pigeons, has in its name the source of a great annoyance to its sensitive fancier. He admits for it an ancestry dating back to the message-bearers of Persian kings and Turkish sultans, and that the peculiarities of structure—the prominent wing-butts, the great muscular development which gives the full-rounded breast, the wing best adapted to speedy and long-continued flight, and the protruding eyeball peculiar to the traveling bird, all points he values for their part in the perfect symmetry—that these were all fixed in its day of usefulness as the courier of royalty. But he is careful to explain that he has counted out all useful qualities and practical values in the bird of to-day; that the points he values highest are those of development of growth to perfect which his bird is carefully secluded from the deteriorating influences of sun and outdoor air; that the name is only applicable to it for its elegant carriage, one of its most valued and to be remarked properties: that it is only the ignorant who could confound the grand high-class bird with that little shapeless message-bearer, the homing pigeon.

The carrier has always been held in the highest esteem in England. Moore, writing in 1735, tells of a fancier in Bishopsgate street who kept a silver hatchet and block with which to chop off the heads of those condemned to death, "that being of the blood royal they ought not to die after the manner of the common herd."

A Prediction Fulfilled.

The following anecdote was related to me in 1864, long before the fulfilment of the prediction that it contains. Napoleon III. one day took it into his head to consult the celebrated chiromancien, Desbarolles, who died the other day at a very advanced age. Desbarolles told him some curious facts respecting his character, his tastes and his past life. "Now," quoth the emperor, "tell me something about the future. Where will my death take place and by what malady shall I die?" Desbarolles hesitated for a moment. "Sire," he said at length, "you have asked me for a frank response, and I will reply to you frankly. You are distined to breathe your last on English soil, and you will perish by the knife." Very curiously was the prediction fulfilled, though the knife proved to be not that of an assassin, but that of a surgeon.

Cleverly Trumped.

Two pretty quick-witted minds came in contact when the Rev. Dr. Vincent introduced at Chautauqua a Chicago clergyman who was to lecture on "Fools." The preliminaries are thus reported: "We are now to have a lecture on fools by one (a very long pause and loud laughter from the audience, when the President concluded from the saving clause) of the wisest men in the country." The lecturer advanced to the desk and responde "I am not half so big a fool as Dr. Vincent (another very long pause, and still more hearty laughter from the audience) would have you suppose."

Dr. York, an infidel lecturer who has lately been visiting New South Wales, on leaving was presented with an album containing photographs of persons and places in the colony. He closed his speech of thanks to the honors by saying, "God bless you!"

YOUNG FOLKS.

A PUZZLED TIGER.

A STORY OF BRITISH INDIA.

Two men sat under a clump of palm-trees on the bank of a small river in upper Bengal eating their tiffin (lunch) with the appetite of men who had been all morning in the open air. One of them, a tall, weather-tanned, black-mustached fellow, was evidently an English officer. His companion, who was a good deal smaller and slighter than himself, did not look much like either a fighter or a hunter; but the almost superstitious reverence paid him by the Hindoo servants shewed that he must be a great man in some way.

In fact, there were few more famous scientists or more adventurous travellers than Professor Anneroyd, Fellow of the British Royal Geographical Society, President of the Calcutta Antiquarian Club, Honorary Member of the Russian Imperial Association of Scientific Research, with other titles too numerous to mention. There was hardly a corner of the earth, however remote or dangerous, into which he had not thrust his little bald head and gold-rimmed spectacles; and people who saw him for the first time, after having heard of his exploits, were greatly startled to see, instead of the big bearded, sun-burned fellow whom they expected, a slender, pale-faced little man, who looked as if he would be knocked up or knocked down by the first mishap that befell him.

In the centre of an open space just behind the two picnickers stood a large looking-glass, which the Professer had just been using in one of his experiments; and at this the native attendants were looking and pointing excitedly, although keeping their distance from it all the while as carefully as if it had been a packet of dynamite.

"See those fellows!" laughed Major Hampton, as he finished his second plate of cold chicken. "I'll be bound they all take you for a magician of the very first class. Just now I overheard two of them having a discussion about what you could be trying to do. One would have it that you were at work to discover a buried treasure."

"So I am,' chuckled the Professor, cutting himself a slice of bread, "but it's a treasure of knowledge, not of money. However, this can't be much fun for you, my dear Major; and its too bad of me to keep you here all day doing nothing, just for my convenience. Couldn't you find a wild beast or two to amuse yourself with while I'm at work?"

"No such luck," replied Hampton, shaking his head. "This bit along the river here used to be a famous cover for the big game; but since they began to cut away the jungle you can't get a decent tiger here for love or money."

The words were scarcely uttered when, as if on purpose to give the lie to them, the native servants, who had been enjoying their long pipes in the cool shade of the trees that flanked the clearing, suddenly sprang up and fled in every direction with shrill cries of terror. Mingling with their outcries came a deep, hoarse roar, which the hardiest sportsman never hears quite unmoved—the cry of a hungry tiger on the track of his prey.

"Up into that banyan-tree for your life, Anneroyd!" shouted Hampton, leaping to his feet, "for that fellow means business, and no mistake."

Up flew the Professor as nimbly as a monkey, and the next instant Major Hampton was beside him. But even in that moment of deadly peril the veteran sportsman had found time to snatch up his double-barrelled rifle and ammunition pouch.

Hitherto the flight of the Hindoos and the fearful sound that accompanied it had been the only signs of the terrible creature's presence. But the Major's keen eyes soon detected a stirring among the bushes, and then a great flat head and fiery eye gliding forth from them.

"Isn't he a splendid fellow?" whispered Hampton, as coolly as if he were looking at the beast through the bars of a cage in a menagerie. "He seems to be in want of a lesson, though, and I'm going to give him one."

But he had hardly loaded one barrel of his rifle when he suddenly broke into a fit of laughter so violent as almost to shake him off his perch. And well he might. The tiger was indeed about to get a lesson, but such a one as neither he nor his two enemies had foreseen in the least.

The tall mirror was still standing in the middle of the clearing, just as the coolies (native porters) had left it; and the tiger, coming out right in front of it, saw (as he thought) another tiger advancing against him open-mouthed. His very whiskers bristled with rage at this defiance, and with a savage growl he drew back for a decisive spring. But in doing so he moved beyond the line of reflection, and instantly the other tiger disappeared as if he had never been.

This was evidently something quite new to the "royal Bengal." He stopped short, stared blankly around him, dropped his tail, and altogether looked so utterly bewildered and foolish that the two watchers almost burst their sides with laughing at him.

"Well," gasped the Major. "If this isn't the best fun I've seen since I came out, my name's not Dick Hampton."

Meanwhile the tiger seemed to have made up his mind that the puzzle lay in the mysterious looking-glass, and that it was his duty to examine it more closely. He crept cautiously toward it, and of course the other tiger reappeared at once. Now for it! With one tremendous bound he was close upon his enemy; but the shock of his leap overturned the mirror, and the phantom tiger vanished once more.

This second disappearance was quite too much for the nerves of the "jungle king." With a low whine of dismay he turned sharp round, and was about to make off, when Major Hampton, who had no notion of losing his game so easily, levelled his rifle and fired. The sting of the bullet in his flank changed the tiger's fear to fury, and with a roar like thunder it darted toward the tree whence the shot had come; but instantly the second barrel sent its charge home, and the monster rolled over into the jungle grass, a harmless heap of black and yellow fur.

A nightgown is nothing but a napsack.

OVER THE OCEAN.

Mr. Gladstone will spend the holiday recess at Hawarden Castle when not engaged in his canvass in Scotland.

The total coal output in Great Britain last year was 159,351,415 tons, with 520,632 colliers employed, against 160,757,779 tons and 520,360 colliers employed the preceding year.

The backwardness of the season in Scotland is seriously retarding agricultural operations; and in some districts farm work is less advanced than it has been for a great many years past,

Her Majesty has written a letter to Elizabeth Mouat, the heroine of the Columbine, expressing sympathy with her in the sufferings she endured in her memorable voyage, and sending at the same time a check for £20.

A copy of Dickens' "Strange Gentleman," one of the rarest of his productions, was recently bought by a small bookseller for three pence. By him it was sold for 15s to a young man in the trade, he in his turn disposing of the book to another person for £1. This last knew the value of his prize, and, in spite of its being imperfect, resold the the volume for £5 to a well-known firm of booksellers, who now want somewhere about £12 for it. A perfect copy is worth £20. It is quite a small pamphlet, and has been reprinted—without the frontispiece.

In the confederation of Switzerland, with a population of about two millions and a half, or just one half that of London and its suburbs, there are no less than four languages. Out of every thousand of inhabitants about 600 speak Germain, 227 French, 56 Italian, and 17 Romanisch. Each of these languages represents a separately and sharp-defined race, and in addition to this multiplicity of race and language, the Swiss are divided in the matter of religious confession; in every thousand of the population there being roughly 600 Protestants to 400 Roman Catholics. Surely it is no small praise to the constitution of Switzerland and to its administration, that with such diversity of race tongue and religion, there should be a profound common sentiment causing Germain, French, and Romanisch alike to cherish as the strongest political feeling—affection for the fatherland.

Truth learns that the Princess of Wales has really been suffering from blood-poisoning. Her Royal Highness is now convalescent, but it is probable that during the Easter holidays she will either go abroad for a short time, or else take a cruise in the Royal yacht, Osborne. The Princess' health cannot yet be pronounced to be entirely satisfactory, as she will require much care for a considerable time to come. The Low Church people at Torquay are by no means pleased that the Princess should have "sat under" Mr. Hewitt, the vicar of Babbacombe, who is locally known as "Father" Hewitt, and is one of the most "advanced" clergymen in the West of England. The Duchess of Sutherland is a regular member of the congregation, and Babbacombe is a very attractive church, the musical services being exceptionally good.

Baroness Burdett-Coutts (says Life) has been carrying out the suggestion of cooking savory dishes for the poor in Westminster, and the results are most encouraging. Large supplies of scraps are sent in, which are carefully cooked and prepared into soup, stews, pies and puddings, and these are sold at 1 penny a dish to the poor, who gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of procuring a good meal at such a price. The girls at the Guards' Industrial Home have been called to assist in this good work, and for some time prepared the meals in their own kitchen, but the business has so largely increased that suitable premises have been secured where the work is done. Lady Wolseley started a Mayfair scrap cart, and has organized her plan so systematically that large quantities of really dainty morsels are collected and sent to Westminster two or three times a week, and add greatly to the material in hand. Under the auspices of Lady Sudeley a similar collecting cart will go about Belgravia.

Switzerland, since the time of the Romans, Bellinzona has been a very important military post, for it is the southern key to the Gotthard Pass, and commands the whole valley of the Ticino. In old times the conquering cantons of Eri Schwyz and Unterwalden sent in turn a Landvegt or governor to rule in Bellinzona over the province, and each canton built itself a mighty castle. All three remain, and their ancient towers and hoary battlemented walls, built as they are upon commanding eminences, give the town an old world and picturesque appearance. Some thirty years ago, too, the Swiss confederation, profoundly impressed with the necessity of making good the Gotthard Pass against all comers, flung a line of fortifications right across the valley just below the town. To a layman, this picturesque zigzag of turreted masonry looks very formidable, and as if no man or mouse could overleap such a wall much less an army; but military critics assert that so rapid has been the advance in the art of war, that as a work of defence it is now absolutely valueless.

A geese which has just died at Stuttgart left the flock, while still a gosling, and resolved to have nothing more to do with its companion geese, but to try a new way of life for itself. So it boldly marched into the barracks of a Uhlan regiment one day and stationed itself next the sentry box. The Uhlans were touched by the geese choosing to ally itself with their corps, and built a shed for it to live in. For twenty-three years neither threats or persuasion were able to separate this bird from its adopted regiment. When the corps changed quarters the geese went with them, and when the Uhlans went to fight for their country the desolate creature took up for a time with a battalion of infantry; but no sooner did the first Uhlans enter the town than the goose marched out to meet them, and went with them to her old quarters. Since her death she has been stuffed, and is to be seen in a glass case on the gate of the barracks of Stuttgart.

When Franklin bottled the lightning he was considered an Ajax; the pulpit thundered against his daring impiety. It was echo of the ancient curse on the first tiller of the ground, the first builders of towers, the first bearer of fire and the arts to men. Nevertheless, one of Jove's bolts was bottled; and, from that time, it has been studied and analyzed, until science has learned how to store up lightning and regulate its action. Some years ago a Frenchman crossed the English channel bringing sixteen thunderstorms in a Gladstone bag. He conveyed to Sir William Thompson, at Glasgow, so many little metal boxes, crammed lightning. Dr. Buchanan came in one day to borrow one of these boxes, saying that he wanted to use it on a patient,—a little child that had a tumor on its tongue, which he was afraid to cut off or to burn off in the old way; the heated wire sometimes loses its heat, has to be reheated, causing much pain. The stored electricity was taken to the child's room, the wire was kept at one heat. In one second the lightning touched off the tumor, painlessly, soft as a mother's kiss; and the child is well.

THE STORM'S APPEARANCE.

An Eye Witness Describes the Cyclone in Minnesota.

The best testimony that can be had from eye witnesses of the storm is to the effect that the cloud was somewhat different in appearance from cyclones in general as reported. Hon. J. A. Demeules, an ex-member of the house of representatives was at his house near George lake, not far from the track of the storm. He told a reporter of the appearance of the cloud. Said he: "It must have formed rapidly, and just above the lake, as it was there when I first noticed it. It was very black, and seemed to be constantly in motion. At first I thought it was the smoke from some large fire and it was moving rapidly across the lake when I first saw it. It was flat and oval in shape, with a sort of spiral at each of the extremities, one extending upward and the other downward. It was peculiar in appearance, and I watched it closely when it had passed across the lake. It seemed to stop. Its movement resembled that of a fan opening and closing, and it remained stationary for some seconds. Almost instantly its form changed. Instead of lying flat, it seemed to turn on end and the spirals that had run up from the other end formed a part of a big double spiral. It had a movement that was peculiar, as if there was a commotion within it.

ITS COURSE WAS RAPID

and as soon as the big spiral was formed it began moving at a terrific rate in a course that was somewhat zigzag. It dropped down to the ground, and I saw the entire work of ruin. Its course after it crossed the river was rather sinuous, though hardly as much so as before. It swept across the country, and in five minutes from the time it reached the Sauk Rapids the work of destruction was done." A Mr. Clarke was driving with Mr. Cooper of the State board of agriculture. He said that he had seen the cloud form. There were two at first that came together directly over the lake, and then turned on end and swept onward. A daughter of Governor Gilman corroberates Mr. Demeule's story. She saw it when it lay like a fan, and she said it was apparently standing still. She thought it was the smoke from some large fire and ran to a lookout on the top of the governor's house, to discover where the fire was. Before she had reached the top the cloud had turned and was approaching with terrible rapidity and was already creating havoc, whereupon she ran down. A gentleman who did not give his name told Mr. Alexander Rigg, of Monticello, who was here that he had seen a man in the spiral rapidly moving after the clouds had passed Sauk Rapids three or four miles. There are one or two missing, and it is possible that it may have been the druggist who had not been found.

A peculiarly sad incident occured at Sauk Rapids, Minn. Out in the rubbish some rods from the depot, wandering about the stricken neighborhood, was a middle-aged man. He looked haggered and took no notice of the curious people who constantly passed him in their search among the ruins. It was Charles Shellgreen. His home had been leveled to the ground by the cyclone, and he was wandering near the spot where his home had once stood. He was a poor man and had nothing but his home. One of the visitors was the Rev. Mr. Pierce, of Fergus Falls, who had once preached at Sauk Rapids, and not knowing how Mr. Shellgreen had been afflicted, he approached him and asked if he had lost any besides his house. The man stopped, walked up and shook hands with the man of God and said "my baby." He could go no further, but sat upon the ruins of his home, and the tears rolled from his eyes as his voice thickened. His entire family had been killed, a wife and four children. The woman and three of the children lay over in the dead house awaiting their coffins, but the fourth, a little girl baby of some weeks, had not been found. The minister could not say cheer up, and he left the man sitting alone and desolate, with the tears streaming from his dazed eyes.

A Manly Word to Boys.

You are made to be kind, boys, generous, magnanimous. If there is a boy in school who has a club foot, don't let him know you ever saw it. If there is a poor boy with ragged clothes, don't talk about rags in his hearing. If there is a lame boy, assign him some part in the game that doesn't require running. If there is a dull one, help him to learn his lesson. If there is a bright one, be not envious of him; for if one boy is proud of his talents, and another is envious of them, there are two great wrongs, and no more talent than before. If a larger or stronger boy has injured you and is sorry for it, forgive him. All the school will shew by their countenance how much better it is than to have a great fuss.

A Leopard Can Change His Spots.

"That, my young friend, is a leopard,' observed a schoolmaster at the Zoo the other day as he was showing off before three or four favorite pupils. "Notice the spots upon his skin. Can the Ethioplan alter his skin or the leopard change his spots?"

"Yes, sir," unexpectedly replied a keeper who was standing near; "that 'ere one often does."

"How so?" inquired the schoolmaster, eagerly, with visions of discoveries floating before his eyes. "Explain yourself, my friend."

"There, sir! Didn't you see her? She's just done it," answered the keeper. "She was first of all a-lying down on this spot, and then she get up and changed, and now she's lying down on that spot."

Exit keeper amidst disgust of schoolmaster and stifled laughter of pupils.

Concert.—The concert given last Tuesday evening under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society of Christ Church was a grand success. The progam was lengthy and ably sustained many of the renderings were really excellent. We would like to give a more extended notice but time and space compells brevity.

Our esteemed friend, Will. Rutledge, left on Saturday to take a situation on the Fort William paper. Will. is a good typo, and has rare abilities as a job printer, and besides is a young man of excellent morals and enviable social qualities. He served his apprenticeship in this office, and we therefore the more earnestly wish him success.

"Papa," asked a little 3-year-old, "why do I say a short prayer and you a long prayer?"

"Because you are not old enough to learn a long prayer," exclaimed the father.

"Is that it? I thought it was because I haven't got wicked enough yet to have to say a long prayer."

Tree'd a Porkentine.—On Saturday last while several of our young men were fishing in the Saugeen river one of them treed a porcupine, but not having a long range shooting iron with them, the prospects of capturing brother quill seemed poor; however, F. Porter thinking of the greased pole to be climbed on the Queen's Birthday in Markdale, and the prize, decided to commence practice and forthwith successfully climbed the tree, going out on a branch—not the one with the other quill bird on—he shook the tree, and he shook it, and shook it, and shortly down came the game kerwhallop to the ground. It was abused in such a manner that its life was despaired of, and in a few hours death ended its sufferings. An inquest was held by Dr. Irwin, assisted by druggist Stephen. The jury returned a verdict of death by ill treatment at the hands of F. Porter and others.

New York, May 10.—A Sun's London special says the inevitable defeat of the Home Rule Bill has been acknowledged by Ministers. Mr. Gladstone has been driven to surrender his position maintaining the exclusion of the Irish members from Westminster by the tremendous opposition of Liberals and Radicals whose total number is about 90.

Close Call.—On Saturday evening last about ten o'clock, Rud Mathews was on his return, it is said, after seeing his girl home in the village, and when near Trimble's store, he was startled by a pistol shot, the bullett grazing his head: Whether it was an accident, or done maliciously through jealousy is not known, neither is there any suspicion as to who did it.

Alfred Moffat went to Toronto last week, as stated in the Standard, to consult an optician, and we exceedingly regret that it was found necessary to remove the left eye altogether. His right eye is not seriously affected by the loss of the other. His brother Thomas accompanied him to the city and during the operation. Alf. is one of our most promising young men, and has the sympathy of the community.

This is supposed to be definition of "dude" as it will appear in the new revised edition of Webster:—"Dude," n. [Sometimes written Dodo.] The name applied to a breed of dandy puppies, indigenous to the United States. The dude is generally slim legged, and not unfrequent long-eared. Easily distinguished by the lightness of its head. Can be trained to fetch and carry a cane. The dude is harmless.

In reference to the sad accident which happened to Alfred Moffat on Good Friday there appears to be a wrong impression abroad as to who fired the gun, many thinking it was the boy Alf. himself. The facts, as far as we can learn, are as follows: Johnston Wilson, son of Rev. A. Wilson, came into the foundry with a small breech-loading rifle with part of breech off. He got the trigger filed as he wanted, and while going out he put in a cartridge and fired before he got outside the premises. Alf. had followed to the door and was struck in the eye by a portion of the cartridge All was done so quickly that no one in the shop knew Wilson was going to fire or had cartridge on his person.

Owen Sound, May 10.—This morning about 2 o'clock a fire occurred in a small frame building on Division street, owned by John Patton. Before the flames could be extinguished the building was totally destroyed. There were four young men sleeping up-stairs in the house at the time, one of whom: Henry Archer, a shoemaker, lost his life. A young man Peter Bruce, who was a room-mate of Archer, was badly burnt in making his escape. The other two barely escaped with their lives having to jump from a back window, leaving their clothes behind. The cause of the fire is unknown. There was a small insurance on the contents of the building in the Citizens' & Mercantile Insurance Company.

Flowers, Beautiful Flowers.

I wish to heartily thank the residents of Markdale and vicinity for their liberal patronage last year, and hope to visit them again soon with Flowers. I have a good selection of House Plants, Hanging Baskets, Coleus, and Bedding Plants; also Cabbage, Cauliflower, Tomatoe, Cucumber, Pepper, and Celery Plants, in season.

A good stock of Plants will be kept for sale at Flesherton Restaurant.

A MODERN MIRACLE.

In a recent letter from B. W. Dowson, of Deloraine, Ont., he states that he has recovered from the worst form of dyspepsia, after suffering for fifteen years; and when a council of doctors pronounced him incurable he tried Burdock Blood Bitters, six bottles of which restored his health.

A Sensation.—Last Saturday morning quite a sensation was caused in town over a report that got pretty widely circulated to the effect that Joseph Ramsay had been seriously assaulted the night previous on his way home from Keppel by unknown men, who had fired three shots at him. On enquiry it was found that Ramsay had received a bullet wound in the arm, but nothing serious was apprehended from its effects. Since it has transpired that the probabilities are that Ramsay must have shot himself by an accidental discharge of his revolver, as no clue could be traced as to the perpetrators. Joe, however, maintains that he was taken for a detective and shot by Keppelites. The prevailing opinion is, however, that the whole thing is a hoax, and that no assault took place. For further particulars call on Joe himself and hear him unfold the dreadful story of his narrow escape.—[Owen Sound Advertiser.

THE FARM.

Deadly Spray for Orchard Insects.

Twenty-five to thirty years ago my orchard bore full crops every alternate year of smooth, round apples. I got money then easier and faster, picking and selling the fruit, than at any other time in my life. The trees were large, and I could set a ladder in a good spot and get a barrelful without moving it. But latterly trees have not borne as well, and apples have been knotty and wormy; caterpillars and cankerworms have increased so as to ruin many orchards. The codlin moth has been worst of all, and the most difficult enemy to hold in check. But I feel sure now that it is an easy thing to destroy the whole crowd of orchard insects, by spraying the trees with London purple—which is much better than Paris green, and cheaper; it does not settle in water as the green does, and does not need one person to stir it as you drive along with a force pump. Mr. George Allen bought a fruit farm near Holly, N. Y., which was in such a condition that the whole neighborhood ridiculed the purchase. Cankerworms were in the orchard, the trees had not been trimmed, and the farm had not paid its way for some time.

He pulled out half the trees, gave the others a good pruning, sprayed with Paris green once a week for a month, and harvested 1,400 barrels of as fine apples as ever were seen; you could hardly find a wormy one. He expects to have some thousands of barrels this year, as many of the trees had been so stripped by cankerworms in '84 that they did not blossom in in '85 at seem sure for this season. Mr. Allen ploughed raised beans and some other spring between part of the trees, put on what manure there was on the farm, but made the most surprising result was spraying. The thinning and pruning was just as necessary. If you think you cannot spend time to spray the trees but once time then is when the apples are as full-sized peas; then the blossom apple stands up, and the poison blossom end where it will good," as the codlin moth the blossom end and lays the egg in way in. hatched eats its

Mr. Arthur Rathbone, of Genesee County, sprayed a tree on one side and left the other. On the sprayed side the apples were fair and not a wormy one; on the other they were knotty, wormy and poor. And the trees appear to bear better if sprayed just before the blossoms open; leaf-rollers—little caterpillars becoming very destructive—get on the blossom-buds before they open, that make them look as if singed; and buds that way set no fruit. This pest also is killed by the poison. Three linseed oil barrels and a force pump with a rubber hose to put in the bunghole, make a good rig to spray with. Be sure and not get too much purple or green. Mr. Rathbone has experimented more than any one else I know; he says that half a pound of purple to sixty gallons of water is plenty. The purple should be wet like paste before putting it in the barrel, and then it will mix easily and not float on the water. Professor A. J. Cook, who first showed the value of this remedy, urges great care upon those who use it; do not turn stock into the orchard till after a heavy rain has washed all the poison from the grass under the trees.

Sheep.

This is the season of the year when sheep need special care, particularly the ewes that are in lamb. Some farmers are in the habit of allowing their sheep to roam over the pastures early in the spring, and do not realize that the meagre quantity of grass they get does them little good, and that being constantly on the move in search for it they lose flesh. They should be turned out only for a short time each day, when the weather is not stormy, and they should have an allowance of grain daily while changing from dry food to grass. By proper attention at this time of year, they will be strong and thrifty when finally they are left on pasture. A pint of corn or oats each day along with their hay will maintain the strength of the sheep and keep them in good flesh. It will be found much better to keep the ewes in the yard until the lambs have gained strength enough to follow their dams easily when placed with the rest of the flock, otherwise they will not make the growth they should. It is a good plan to give the ewes extra feed while they are suckling their lambs, so they will provide a full supply of milk.

Those who make a specialty of breeding stock for exhibition give their animals the best care and attention, and succeed in accomplishing that which the ordinary farmer would not believe to be possible. It is admitted that such animals, by living in artificially heated buildings, and being fed on prepared food, as well as having been closely inbred, are sometimes lacking in vitality, and prove failures when in the hands of the farmer. But thoroughbred stock is not intended for general farm purposes. Their true mission is to improve the common stock. The common stock by constant subjection to the weather and changeable diet, become hardy and vigorous, yet lacking in desirable qualities. The blending of the blood of the thoroughbred with that of the mongrel will therefore be best for the farmer, and enable him to keep superior stock without resorting to artificial methods for so doing.

One Effect of Prairie Planting.

Upon the treeless plains the snows disappear, says Prof. Bessey in the New York Tribune, very quickly under the hot sun which beats down from the cloudless skies so common there in all seasons. The water cannot penetrate the ground, for it is frozen, and so it runs off and is lost. Where the fire ran over the ground and burned the short prairie grasses, the black surface increased the rapidity of melting. What wonder that the plains of even eastern Nebraska were not long since looked upon as desert-like in their dryness.

With the planting of trees all this is changed. The snow piles up in the plantation of young trees and gathers in enormous drifts in the lee of the narrow "wind-breaks." These masses of snow remain for weeks after the ground elsewhere is entirely bare. The water from these melting snowbanks slowly trickles down over the ground, soaking into it, but little running away. In a recent journey westward over the plains of eastern Nebraska I saw hundreds of places where still slowly melting masses of snow were surface of the ground had been free from for fully a fortnight.

I am assured by many farmers that springs are much more abundant now than formerly, and that in many instances ravines which were dry and dead before the trees were planted are now too wet and springy. This is clearly the result of keeping the rainfall and snowfall upon and in the ground, as is done by tree-planting. I might point out that the cornfields with their wilderness of broken and tangled stems help also to conserve the snows in the winter.

Slow Trains.

A man was one day making a trip on a "mixed" train on a Canadian road. Passes on these trains is never taken except on journeys of considerable length; walking is as easy and much faster for short distances. On this occasion the movement was much more deliberate than usual and the passenger called the conductor to his seat and said:

"Isn't this motion pretty slow?"

"Well, we ain't flying, I'll admit.

"Sure everything is all right?'

"I think—

"Where's a—sed?"

"You, I gre—hem myself."

"This all on

"Yes, we run through four creek back here and soaked—ne whe—so that they would stay."

"Any spokes loose?"

"No."

"You are certain the wheels are all on rolls?"

"They was when I come in."

"Couldn't be possible that any of them left and the axle dragging, could it?"

"I guess not."

"Are we going up hill?"

"No, this is pretty middl'in' level."

"Do you always run at this gait?"

"No, we generally hump along a little faster'n this."

"May I ask what is the trouble then?"

"Certainly. We found a fine two-year-old steer stuck in a trestle back here, but we got on, and stopped and helped him. You know the rules of the road as to cattle in such cases the animal belongs to the company.'

But I don't see why that should make you run so thunderingly slow."

"Why, you blame fool, we're takin' that steer along to headquarters; got it tied behind, and it's used to leadin, and don't walk up very well. I'm doing all I can; got the brakeman prodding it up with an umbrell', and another car tied to the end of the bell rope. If you think I'm goin' to start up and go howlin' along, and yank the horns off as good a steer as there is in the territory, why you're mistaken, that's all. Us trainmen can't expect our pay unless we bring in some stock once'ner while."

Never Satisfied.

A little, with content, is much
To him who'll not refuse it.
Who takes it as the Lord has sent
And—es rightly use it
Most men, with nothing, have a thought
That life would be a pleasure
If they could share, in smallest part,
With those who have the treasure
But is this true? Experience shows
That, in this world of sorrow,
The man who fights for bread to day
Will fight for pie to-morrow.

He vows he does not want the earth;
His thoughts are far above it;
The gold of Indus and of Or,
His simple tastes don't covet.
A very little meets his wants;
Enough to furnish living.
He says, is all a man should ask,
And thank the Lord for giving.
But, is it true? Well, if it be,
The truth you'll have to borrow.
The man who fights for bread to-day
Will fight for pie to-morrow.

Of wealth, fraction's all he asks,
With smallest numerator
Set out in unit bold, above
A large denominator.
That makes the sum of all his joys,
Of all his hopes and blisses;
'Tis all he needs, 'tis all he prays;
'Tis bread and cheese and kisses.
But, is it true? You bet it ain't,
For in this world of sorrow,
The man who fights for bread to-day
Will fight for pie to-morrow.

HEALTH.

Diseased Money.

A writer gives some very pertinent advice on this subject:

In the numerous speculations as to the variety of ways and channels through which the germs of contagious disease may be disseminated, there is one to which but little or no importance has thus far been attached, but which, nevertheless, probably plays an important role. We refer to that universal circulating medium—money. It passes impartially from the hand of the millionaire into that of the beggar, constantly circulating through every class and condition of society. The person of fastidious taste, who will turn from his path rather than risk coming into actual contact with others of uncleanly dress or person will receive, hand and carry in his pocket without the slightest symptoms of disgust, or perhaps without giving it a thought, money that has thousands of times passed through hands or reposed in pockets whose contact he would discern to be pollution.

In respect to the dangers that may arise from this cause, paper money is undoubtedly more to be feared than coin, and the indescribably filthy appearance of much of that which is seen in circulation is familiar to all who read this. That the handling of such nasty stuff is often fraught with serious danger, no sensible person can doubt. It would be well if the system said to be in vogue in certain countries of Europe, of destroying every note that comes into the banks and issuing new ones in their stead were practiced with us, though even this would only to some extent lessen and not do away with the danger.

But though paper currency is the most to be feared on the score of communicating coin is by no means free from danger of the same kind. It has been shown that a blackish coating, which may be seen on the grasses and in the milled edges of coins that have been in circulation for a short time, consists of organic filth which on introduction into distilled water and examined by the microscope was found to be swarming with bacteria and fungi.

We are not sanguine enough to expect that our readers shall decline to touch or handle the stuff, for the reasons here pointed out, but we can not refrain from uttering our protest against the unutterable filthiness, of which many persons are guilty who would feel themselves deeply insulted at any insinuation of a lack of refinement or good breeding, of placing paper currency or coin in the mouth for temporary convenience, while making change or the like. This most disgusting habit is singularly enough confined almost exclusively to women and is an outcrop of thoughtlessness only, if any who read this ever practice it we feel sure they will never do again.

Vitality of Males and Females.

Some interesting facts concerning the relative vitality of males and females are shown in the forty-sixth annual report of the English registrar general. In each 1,000 living persons there are 487 males and 513 females; but for every 100 females 103.5 males were born. At every age of life the death rate was lower in the females, and the difference greater in early years. In both sexes diminished death rate is taking place is more marked in females than at all ages. The improvement is only notable in women up to 45 and men to 35. The mean expectation of a male at birth is 41.35, and of a 44 62 years. The annual expectation of illness is, counted by the days, nearly same in both sexes.

Pindar's oldest boy has for a long time been paying attention to Miss Already, but could not muster up courage enough to test his fate. The other evening he presented her with a pair of gloves. She sweetly accepted them with the remark:

"Thank you. Do you want to take a hand in these?"

What Would the World Do without woman? asks the essayist who starts out to say something new on this oft-treated subject. Of course, the human element of the world would not exist without woman, so the question is gratuitous. It would have been far more sensible to ask: What would the world do without the salvation of woman, without a panacea for her physical ills and cure for her peculiar diseases. In a word, what would the world do without Dr. Pierce's "Favorite Prescription," the great remedy for female weaknesses? It is indispensible for the ills of womankind.

More than four thousand devices for coupling have been patented, and yet thousands of bachelors and maidens go it alone in this country.

Nightmare,

sick-headaches, depression of spirits, and want of ambition are symptoms of a diseased liver. The lungs, stomach, and bowels are all in sympathy. Life is only a living death. Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery" acts upon the torpid liver, and effectually removes all these difficulties and disorders. Nervous feelings, gloomy forebodings, and irritability of temper all disappear.

That was a cautious old tramp who said, being asked whether he would have a drink of whisky, as he was beginning a job of sawing wood, or would have it when he had finished it, answered: "Well, mum, I think I'll take it now. There has been a pile of sudden deaths lately."

Young or middle-aged men suffering from nervous debility and kindred weaknesses should send 10 cents in stamps for large illustrated treatise suggesting sure means of cure. World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, N. Y.

A young Sunday-school teacher was trying to impress upon her class the duty of renouncing pomp and vanities in Lent. Thinking that she was not quite understood she said: "Can anyone tell me the meaning of pomp?" "Yes, I know," said one little girl, eagerly. "It's something that we have in our back yard."

Do not take Pills or Powders containing Calomel, for, at this time of the year, the result may be serious. If you require a dose of physic take Dr. Carson's Stomach and Constipation Bitters; it acts gently on the Bowels, purifies the Blood, improves the circulation, stimulates the Liver and Kidneys, and speedily cures Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Indigestion. Search the Drug tores from one end of Canada to the other, and you cannot find a remedy equal to it. Try it and use it in your families. Sold everywhere in large bottles at 50 cents.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

"I was readin' in de paper yesterday," Brother Gardner as the meeting opened in de usual style—"I was readin' a la-mentashun de ole fashun'd man an' woman had died off an' would be seen no me' on dis yearber. Izo glad on it. De ole-fash-ion'd man scraped off de measure when he measured out; he believed dat any sort of bed an' any sort of bed was good 'nuff fur him; he took the biggest piece of meat on de table; he ate mo' like a hog dan a man bein'; if he had sympathy it was for his cattle instead of his fam'ly. De ole-fash-ion'd man was a reg'lar attendant at church meetin', but he worked his hired men twenty hours out of twenty-four just to show his religun, but doerin' de odder six days of de week he was a bad man to trade hosses wid. It took his wife months to git up de courage to ax him for a new kaliker dress, an' mos' of his children growed up an' went away from home wizout a reco-lec-ek-shuu of a dozen words.

De ole-fashun'd man had two recipes for his fellow-bein's. De fust was hard work; de nex' was boneset tea. He had but two ideahs in regard to boys. De fust was lots o' work an' a leetle schoolin'; de nex' was lots o' lickins and no holidays. He had but two ideahs in regard to bizness. De fust was git all ye kin; de nex' was keep what ye git. He argued dat a liar could never enter de kingdom of Heaben, but he let go out an' lick a sick ox to death without any fear about his hearafter. He preached loudly dat de Lawd would increase de crops, but he kept his hired hands down to de lowest possible figger. He made a big show of submittin' to de will of Provi-dence, but if 500 pounds of hay got wet in a storm some of de chill'n come in for lickin' befo' night.

"De ole-fashun'd man an' woman hev de-parted, an' de world hasn't lost a cent by it. It was a good depart. Wicked as some may claim de world to be, I feel dat I kin look into de alverage crowd an' pick mo' honesty, humanity, religun, sympathy an' fellowship dan could be found in a ten-acre lot of old-fashun'd men. Let us now pro-ceed to bizness."

CAN'T RECONSIDER.

The secretary announced the following communication from Point Pleasant, W. Va.:

Brother Gardner:

DEAR SIR—I see by the proceedings of a late meeting that you are not an admirer of corn doctors. Being a corn doctor and toe and finger nail trimmer I most earnestly protest, and hope that the late action of the "club" concerning such doctors will be reconsidered. I am also the inventor of Tansey's corn and bunion exterminator, and will forward free a trial bottle to any one obtaining your certificate that he is a member in good standing in the Lime-Kiln club. Yours,

PHLEGM MCCANEY.

"De co'n doctah," said the President, "am a pusson who makes a bizness of re-movin' co'ns an' chargin' fifty cents aplece. In about fo' weeks de removed co'ns turn up ag'in, while de co'n doctah has moved on to greener fields. A bunion ex-terminator, as I understan' it, am a salve to exterminate bunions. In a couple of weeks after the bunion am 'sterminated you look down at yer heel an' you diskiver dat she has returned from her trip to de sea-shc' an' am ag'in bent on doin' a rushin' bizness by de fall an' winter. Dis club has an-nounced to de world de fack dat it has lost faith in de co'n doctah an' his remedies, an' we ain't gwine to take it back. We kin suffer, but we can't saultify ourselves."

BRO JONES WILL GO.

The following letter, from Carlisle, Ky., was then presented to the meeting:

CARLISLE, KY., MARCH 23, 1886.

To Pres. Gardner and the L. C.:

Annexed to this enterprising little town is the village of Henryville, a town of about 600 souls all belonging to the colored race. Recently a society was formed composed of twenty of Henryville's best citizens and called the Henryville Gardner Club. The idea of the society is to elevate and educate the colored people to a higher standard, and we find we cannot be successful without outside aid or without connection with a stronger organization, the L. C. being the best and most influential society of the kind in the United States.

We pray for admission into your ranks, and would be pleased to have you or Brother Giveadam Jones come down at once and properly initiate us and deliver the first lecture before our society.

Humbly,

HARRISON PIPER, Secretary.

On motion of Lakadoshul Burrows the Henryville band was accepted as a branch lodge, empowered to work to the 31st de-gree, and authorized to use the picture of the Torpedo Chicken on its banners for street parade.

"Brudder Jones kin prepar' hisself to go down dar widout delay," said the President, "an' in gwine so fur away from home it will be well fur him to remember:

"Pay Your Bills."

A well-known business man hailed us to-day with:

"Come here, I want to interview you."

The idea of a merchant interviewing a newspaper man was so odd that the call was answered right away.

"What made you put that article in the paper, headed, 'Pay Your Bills?'" he asked.

"Because," we replied, "it appears to be the proper thing to do."

"Well," he said, "you are right; it was the proper thing to do. Now let me tell you that I have been in business here for several years, and before in other places, and I believe I know what I am talk-ing about when I say that if everybody would pay the bills he owes to his neigh-bors once in thirty days, or upon presenta-tion, there would be very little of what we call 'hard times.' The man who owes a dollar and has got it to pay, but hangs to it, prevents the payment of a great many debts. The journey that a dollar travels the first week of the month, and time it makes, as we may say when we talk of race horses, would surprise the man who never investi-gated. I marked a dollar once and kept track of it a few days, requesting each man to keep a record of whom it was received by him, and to whom payed. Before it disap-peared, about the end of the first week of the month, it had paid between twenty-five and thirty dollars in debts. Not long ago I presented a bill of about forty dollars to a man abundantly able to pay it. I knew he had the money. But he looked scared and said, 'I can't collect my bills, you know; wait awhile.' Now that forty dollars be-longed to me, but he had it in his possession, and of course I couldn't take it away from him. If he had paid it to me, as he ought to have done, I should have paid it out al-most immediately, and the chances are that it would have been kept going, and by this time have paid ten times its value in debts.

"You see," he went on, "money is valu-able when it is in circulation. Like blood in a man's body, when stagnant it is of no use. There are too many cowards. A man who gets scared and grips his dollars when he ought to pay his debts with them, does the public a positive injury. His money would certainly return to him through cre-ditors. The financial coward does more to bring on hard times than any other cause. He is a stumbling block and a nuisance. We talk of the timidity of capital. It is not the money, but the men who handle it, who are timid.

"You were right," he continued, "when you said that if everybody will pay his bills next week, in three months' time business will be good and money plenty. We can make courage and confidence if we will. Some men who are chronic dead-beats put on a great deal of style. I could point you out a man who dashes up and down Dele-ware street behind a hired fast horse, and his creditors are thicker than bees. He stands them off and rides, while they have to take wind for money and walk. He is 'kiting' now, but he is sure to come down in dishonor and disgrace. Let every hon-est man who can do it, square up with his neighbors to whom he owes a few dollars, and times will ease up at once. There is plenty of money, plenty of produce, and plenty of everything except honesty and courage. Honesty and courage will restore confidence. The croaker, whether it be a newspaper or business man, will soon quit his croaking, and nobody will remain with a woeful tale about hard times except the professional dead-beat, who is always look-ing for an excuse for dishonesty.

The Earth as a Timekeeper.

A problem which is attracting to its study astronomers, relates to the earth as a time-keeper. We measure time by dividing either the period during which the earth revolves around the sun, or that in which it turns on its own axis By the first method we mea sure a year; by the second a day. The earth, according to some astronomers, is losing time. Through two causes, the sun's attraction, and the friction, so to speak of the tides, the earth each year revolves more slowly on its axis. The speculative ques-tion which these astronomers are discussing is whether in the end the earth will stop its revolution upon its axis, and will present always the same face to the sun. When the event occurs, there will be perpetual day in one part of the earth, and perpetual night in another. But there is no occasion for immediate alarm. The rate at which the earth is supposed to lose time, only shortens the year by half a second in a cen-tury. There are more than thirty-one and a half million seconds in a year. Therefore, if the earth ever does cease to revolve on its axis, it will be more than six thousand million years before it will stop.

She Had Missed Her Man.

A teacher in one of the Indian schools re-lates the following incident of an Indian boy's quick thought. He had asked the meaning of the word miss. "To miss," I told him, "is the same as to fail. You shoot at a bird or at a mark and do not hit it; you miss it. You go to a tailor's for a coat, and your coat fits badly, it is a miss-fit. You hope to enter the middle class next year, but you cannot pass the examl-nation, and so you miss the promotion."

His face wore a puzzled air and he shook his head.

"Then," said I, "there is another mean-ing of miss. We call a married woman madam, but an unmarried woman, miss."

His face brightened. He smiled and nod-ded. "Ah, I see," said he, "she has miss-ed her man."

Too Fond of Medicine.

"I see you have got that black bottle filled again!" remarked Mrs. Splatterby, the other day, as Splatterby was hunting around for the sugar.

"Yes," replied Splatterby, "a little some-thing is good to have about the house in case of sickness."

"I don't think whiskey a good medicine," said Mrs. Splatterby.

"And why isn't it, I would like to know?" asked Splatterby, with some degree of feel-ing. "Many of the most eminent physi-cians recommend it."

"Well," said Mrs. Splatterby, with a composed cast of countenance. "If it is a good medicine, it don't agree with your sy-stem. I notice that you are never well while there is a drop of the stuff in the house."

The Sobbing Wren.

There is a bird in southwestern Texas known as the sobbing wren Its note begins in a high silvery key, descending from one sweet note to another, each more delightful-ly clear than the other, until it bursts into a sobbing cry, ending in a gasp like that of a suffering child. The effect of this strange song is startling and distressing as it is borne on the early morning air, or at twilight. The bird is small, with a plump brown breast, speckled with shreds of black.

Ice two inches thick will support a man. No wonder then that ice-dealers, who store their houses with ice from ten to twenty inches through, can live in luxury.

SPRING SALAD.

Awfully bored—Artesian wells.

The English swallow—"'Ah' and 'Ah.'"

The original boy cot—Cain's little crib.

Are hatters and bootmakers divinities because they shape our ends?

A somewhat weather-beaten tramp being asked what was the matter with his coat, replied, "Insomnia; it hasn't had a nap in ten years."

An Irishman, mourning his wife, tearfully exclaimed: "Faith, an' she was a good woman; she always hit me wid de soft end o' the mop."

"It is always the beginning of Lent at our house." "I don't understand you." Don't you know we have hash Wednesday all the year round."

There is said to be a sort of sympathy between extremes. To illustrate—many a homely man's head has been turned by a pretty woman's foot.

A lady waiter asks: "Why don't bache-lors marry?' That's so—why don't they? Come to think about it, we have never yet seen a bachelor who was married. It's lamentable, too.

When the fashionable young lady makes a dive and grab at her dress skirt, a fellow feels very much like dodging, for she acts for all the world like she was going for a brick.

Now comes the season when the fashion-able belle, who has been shocked all Winter at the opera ballet, goes to the seaside and displays the last new style in bathing dresses.

"Now, look'er yer, Charlie, Jim mout be an honest nigger and then, again, he mou-ten't; but if I was a chicken and know'd he was about the yard, I tell ye wot, nigger, I'd roost high—that I would."

Vicar's daughter—"Well, Tommy, how are you all getting on?" Tommy—"Nice-ly, thrnk you, miss. Oi get a gumboil, mother she's got the rheumatics, and father e've got a month in jail!"

First small boy—"Say, Johnnie, where are you in Sunday-school?" Second small boy—"Oh, we're in the middle of original sin." First small boy—"That ain't much; were's past redemption."

"Is there any plural to deer?" asked Professor Snore of his class in grammar. "I think there must be, for there is a plural to beer. You can say 'two beers;' I've often heard it," replied Tom Anjerry.

A Toronto man by feeding a tramp found a long lost brother of his wife. We suppose this ought to be taken as a solemn warning against something or other, because he has had to keep on feeding him ever since.

Husband (desperately)—"Life has no longer any charms for me. I'll kill myself. I'll take poison." Wife (calmly)—"Well, if you do take poison, my dear, get the kind that's advertised: Don't die in the house.'"

It takes a very strong-minded young Romeo to talk nonsense to a gentle Juliet at 11 P. M., when the screams of a colicky baby across the street are splitting the stilly stillness of the night from the cradle to the curbstone.

A Guelph lady recently married, seeing her husband coming into the house, slipped quietly behind him and gave him a hearty kiss. The husband told her that she offend-ed all propriety. "Pardon! pardon!" said she, naively. "I did not know it was you."

"Say, Mrs. Smith," complained an irate boarder at a Bond street boarding house the other day, pointing to a dish in front of him, "you shouldn't put such stuff as that before hogs." "That's so," the old lady snappishly remarked; "here, Jane, bring that dish to this end of the table."

In Corea, so we are informed by a re-turned traveler, both men and women wear hats in and out of doors. varying in width from three to six feet. Under these circum-stances we are not surprised when we are told that there has not been a theatrical performance in Corea for the last four years.

A clergyman who was consoling a young widow on the death of her husband spoke in a very serious tone, remarking that he was "one of the few. Such a jewel of a Chris-tian—you cannot find his equal, you well know." To which the sobbing fair one re-plied, with an almost broken heart, "I'll bet I will."

Pompey took little Ethel to see the last batch of chickens making their first appear-ance in the world. "I wonder they've got the strength to break their way out of the shell." "Why, ze see, Miss Ethel," said Pompey, sagaciously, "dey makes a mighty big effort at last 'case dey's afeard o' bein' bliged if dey stay longers."

An elderly lady who, with her daughter, has but recently returned from a rapid journey through England, France, part of Germany and Italy, was asked the other day if they had visited Rome, and she re-plied in the negative. "La! me, yes we did," said the daughter, "that was the place, don't you know, where we bought the bad stockings?"

A skeptic who was trying to confuse a Christian colored man by contradictory passages in the Bible, asked how it could be that we are in the Spirit and the Spirit in us; he received the following reply: "Oh, dar's no puzzle bout dat; its like dat poker. I puts it in de fire til it gets red hot. Now, de poker's in de fire, and de fire's in de poker."

The height of magnificence in Protestan weddings is undoubtedly one in Westt minster Abbey. When a cosmopolite American who was betrothed to an English girl said: "What do you think of my being married in the Abbey?" "Undoubt edly," was the answer, "since there isn't the goblin of a chance of your being buried in Westminister, the next best thing is to be married there."

Young playwright—"Well, Mr. Bun-comb, have you read my comedy?" Bun comb—"Yes, and I find I shall be unable to use it. It has some good points, my dear boy, but its crude—very crude." Young playwright—"Then you couldn't think of putting it on the stage?" Buncomb —"Well, I didn't mean to say that. I could have it ground up and use it for a snowstorm, if you would care to have it put on that way." (Exit playwright abruptly.)

CANNIBALISM IN HAYTI.

Fearful Practices Among the People of the Black Republic.

The following is a translation from Le Peuple of January 23, a journal published at Port-au-Prince, Hayti:—"General Al-fred Millard, commanding the arrondisse-ment of Grand Goave, accompanied by the police, proceeded last week to arrest ten or twelve persons of both sexes who were carrying on a trade of killing people in order to sell their flesh in the market-place at Grand Goave. The citizen who has report-ed this fact to us is in every way worthy of belief. When these people were being con-ducted to the town, a woman who had taken the communion but a few weeks before, overcome by remorse, died on the way, and her body was buried by the escort. Another, named Sophia (corrected Francoise) arrived at the town tied on a donkey, was recog-nized by the neighbors and by the wife of our informant, who spoke to her thus; 'How is it, Sister Sophia (Francoise,) you who have been cook to Padre Frehel, you who have taken the Communion scarcely fifteen days ago, you feast on human flesh? You should have committed suicide rather than have permitted yourself to be brought here in this state. Arriving at the police office, situated about twenty paces from the house of this lady, the said Sophia (Fran-coise) was taken from the donkey quite dead, and immediately the prisoners had to dig a grave in which she was buried. The other anthropophagi have declared that for some time they have sold human flesh for pork in the market of Grand Geave. They have made revelations of great importance, but incredible if it were not certain of the facts, seeing them practised or executed be-fore us." The correspondent who forwards the above to the Daily News says:—"It is an important corroboration of the statements contained in Sir Spencer St. John's, Hayti, or the Black Republic,' as well as of Cap-tain Kennedy's notices of his sojourn in the West Indies. The authorities at Port-au-Prince were very angry at this publication, and threatened to prosecute the editor, Mr. J. J. Audin, for having had the courage to bring before his countrymen what is pass-ing daily in their midst. The women who are supposed to have died of remorse no doubt fell victims to the clubs of the po-lice, who never spare a prisoner, whether innocent or guilty. I trust none of your readers will confound Hayti with its progres-sing neigebor, San Domingo.

A Novelty in Surgery.

An electric light inside the hip-bone of a man is an unusual spectacle, and yet it was witnessed recently at the Postgraduate Med-ical School, in New York city. The light was used in an operation to cure hip disease. A student, twenty-two years old, in the col-lege of Burlington, Vt., slipped on the pave-ment about two months ago and strained his thigh. He soon lost the use of his left leg and suffered excruciating pain. He came to New York, was placed in a cot in the Postgraduate Hospital, and Doctor J. Milton Roberts, a professor in the institu-tion, performed on him a remarkable oper-ation.

The young man was put under the influ-ence of ether, and Dr. Roberts, with a scal-pel, laid bare a portion of the hip-bone about three inches wide. Then he called into play a bone-cutting machine, invented by himself, and called the electro-osteotome. It is worked by an electric battery, and can revolve surgical instruments 12,000 revolu-tions, if necessary, in a minute.

The doctor attached a small drill to the instrument and cut out portions of the hip-bone up to its head, a distance of four inches These pieces of bone under the microscope showed disease. The doctor then used still larger drills until there was a space large enough to admit the entrance of a man's fin-ger. He now wanted to see the exact con-dition of affairs inside of the bone. To do so he used a novelty for this class of work —a tiny incandescent electric light, about as large as a pea. This Dr. Roberts intro-duced inside of the passage in the bone. and the several flashes of light enabled him to see just where the diseased bone was. Then he took up his drill again and cut out the diseased bone wherever it was necessary as easily as if the bone were open before him on an operating table. Dr. Roberts put in a drainage tube to take off diseased matter that might form, sewed up the wound, and applied antiseptic bandages. A hypoder-mic injection of morphine was given to the patient, and when he recovered from the ef-fects of the ether he was in a satisfactory condition, and it is conjectured that he will in a comparatively short time be able to use his disabled limb.

A Pathetic Tragedy in Real Life.

The evidence of little Frankie Gaughan in court in Scranton, Pa., against John McAndrews and wife for the death of his thirteen year old sister (whom they had adopted) was another proof that truth is stranger than fiction, and told a story of real life whose narration Dickens might have en-vied. The child, clad in a calico dress and without shoes and stockings all Winter, beaten and starved, lay at last on a bed of straw in the garret in the early morning of a raw March day, dying. There were no bedclothes there, and she was shivering with cold when her little brother, a little boy of nine, came to see her at five o'clock

"Frankie," cried the dying girl to her brother, as he drew near, "it is so dark and so cold here—so very cold. Lift me a little, please."

Tenderly the boy raised his fragile sister to a sitting posture and moistened her parched lips with water. For an instant the girl revived, but soon relapsed into uncon-sciousness. The boy thought her dead and started to summon a neighbor, but a plain-tive voice caused him to halt. His sister was speaking faintly.

"I just saw a beautiful angel," she said. "It was mother, and she were a crown, too. Yes,"—but here her mind wandered for a moment. "Oh, I'm so cold! Frank-ie, bring Prince (the family dog) and place him on my feet to keep them warm."

The boy did so.

"Water! Water!" whispered the little sufferer. "Angels are coming! Oh, see them, Frankie, see—oh, mother—" But that was all, for the little girl was dead.

USEFUL AND SUGGESTIVE.

Iron rust is removed by salt mixed with lemon juice.

Mortar and paint may be removed from window-glass with hot, sharp vinegar.

To remove paint splashes on window glass moisten the spots with a strong solution of soda. Then rub hard.

There is a goose farm in Virginia on which are kept some 5,000 geese. The main ob-ject is the production of down.

By washing a pine floor with a solution of one pound of copperas in one gallon of strong lye, the appearance of oak flooring may be produced.

The following is a good remedy for burns: Mix four ounces of the yolks of eggs with five ounces of pure glycerine. This forms a kind of varnish.

"I will give any man $100,000 who will produce anything that will prevent a wall of pressed brick from turning white," says a prominent architect. . .

Empty spools are nice to use to hang tow-els and clothing on. Drive nails through them so the head will sink in the end of the spool. No danger of rust in using them.

Boots and shoes may be rendered water-proof by soaking them for some hours in thick soap water. The compound forms a fatty acid within the leather, and makes it impervious to water.

A very convenient rule for determining the speed of circular saws is to divide the number 36,000 by the diameter of the saw in inches. The quotient is the proper num-ber of revolutions per minute.

BORAX SOAP.—Cut an ordinary bar of soap in small pieces; put it in one quart of boiling water, and add one ounce of borax. Let it all melt, but not boil. When cold, cut in pieces, and use like common soap.

It is computed that a twelve-inch wall of hard burned bricks and good lime and sand mortar could be built 1,600 feet high before the bottom layers would be crushed. If Portland cement were added to the mortar, the height might reach 5,700 feet.

Some physicians are prescribing nitro-glycerine as a stimulant in place of brandy. It is said that two drops of one per cent. solution are the equivalent of an ounce of brandy, and that this dose creates no unnat-ural craving.

Lime cartridges are coming into use for blasting purposes. A hole is bored, the lime cartridge inserted, and water is poured over it. The increase in volume of the slacked lime splits and cracks the substance which it is desired to blast.

For turning and drilling wrought-iron and steel, one ounce of a mixture of soft soap, with half its weight of pearl-ash in about one gallon of boiling water, is in everyday use in most engineering shops. The work, though constantly moist, does not rust.

Copper-lined tanks are often known to give trouble by leaking, after a few years, much of which arises from the manner of soldering. Most plumbers use common sol-der, made of lead and tin. For this kind of work pure tin should be used, and the laps thoroughly sweated through. The nails should also be of copper.

A good authority says that a first-class cement, with which to fasten stone to stone, or iron to iron, is made by mixing a paste of pure oxide of lead, litharge and glycer-ine. This mixture hardens rapidly, is in-soluble in acids, and is not affected by heat. It has been used to fasten the different por-tions of a fly-wheel with success, while, placed between stones and once hardened, it is easier to break the stone than the joint.

If it is desirable to set up an anvil so that its use will make the least possible noise, set the anvil on a block of lead; or make a putty ledge around the anvil upon the wooden block, one-half inch clear all round, one inch high. Raise the anvil clear of the block one-half inch, by any means available, pour in the lead until it rises above the bot-tom of the anvil; or set the anvil on a good bed of sand held in a box.

To etch your name on steel tools, proceed as follows: Clean thoroughly of grease, and then spread a thin coat of beeswax, or par-affin, on it, the place where the name is to be. This may be as thin as possible. Then, with a sharp needle point write through the wax to the steel. Paint this over with a mixture of nitric and muriatic acid, in the proportion of six to one respec-tively, and, when bubbles cease to rise, the work is done. Wash in strong soda water.

In order to take away ink spots from paper it is customary to use a blotter, which freely soaks up the liquid, and if, by this means, all traces of the ink do not disap-pear, recourse is had to a salt or some sub-stance having the property of bleaching paper, for instance, oxalate of potassium, etc., to attain this end. A simple modifica-tion of this renders still better services. Take a thick blotting paper or board, steep it several times in a solution of oxalic acid or oxalate of potassium. Then dry it. If there is a spot to be taken away, apply the blotter, which has been prepared in this fashion, to the same. In proceeding thus, the ink is entirely removed. The blotter drinks up the ink, and whitens the paper at the same time.

How Boy's Marbles are Made.

Almost all the marbles with which boys everywhere amuse themselves, says the Scientific Monthly, in season and out of season, on sidewalks and on sandy spots, are made in Oberstein, Germany. There are large agate quarries and mills in that neighborhood and the refuse is turned to good account in providing the small stone ball for experts to "knuckle" with. The stone is broken into small cubes by blows of a light hammer. These small blocks of stone are thrown by the shovelfuls into the hopper of a small mill, formed of a bed-stone, having a level face on its lower sur-face. The upper block is made to revolve rapidly, water being delivered upon the grooves of the bedstone, where the marbles are being rounded. It takes about fifteen minutes to finish a half bushel of good mar-bles, all ready for the boys' knuckles. One mill will turn out 160,000 marbles per week. The hardest "crackers," as the boys call them, are made by a slower process some-what analagous to the other.

MARKDALE MAY 13, 1886

LOWER TOWN.

The West end of our village, across the railway track, is making rapid progress. First we have Irwin & McCay's tannery, which will be in operation this month, and which fills a felt want. The proprietors are men of capital as well as enterprise, and we can cheerfully recommend them to the confidence of the public. Then comes McNea's new plaining factory. This is a fine new building fifty feet square and two story high, built of frame and to be vaneered with brick. The machinery is new and of the most modern and latest improved, so that it will be in advance of anything yet in the district. It will be ready for operation about the 1st June.

A few rods further west we have Armstrong's saw mill, which has been greatly enlarged and thoroughly fitted up with the very best machinery manufactured. This mill is in full blast, has a large stock of excellent logs and is doing splendid work. It is now cutting a large order for the Massie Manufacturing Co., of Toronto, which will take a steady month to complete. Armstrong Bro's, the proprietor's, are young men of commendable push and enterprise. We wish them unbounded success.

Then comes Ritchie's Woollen factory, across the river, the steam whistle of which may be heard four times a day; and a little further the two roller mills, which have a wide and enviable reputation both as superior flour mills and fair dealing on the part of the proprietors Messrs. J. W. Ford and Angus Plewes. We are glad to learn that a sidewalk is likely to be extended as far as Armstrong's mill this season, the proprietors of both saw mill and plaining factory having decided to grant material gratuitous assistance. We might have also noticed, in connection with west end enterprise, W. J. Rowe's saw and grist mill, Orr's lime manufactory, &c., &c., but our article is now sufficiently lengthy.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—In your issue of the 2nd April a letter appears in reply to mine of the 18th March. I should not notice it further, were it not for Mr. Walker's insinuation that I collected and used for private purposes public money which was not necessary to collect. The circumstances referred to evidently is the Government Grant which was delayed at headquarters and did not come to hand for several months after it should have been received and paid out, so that of course it could not be used for private or any other purpose as intimated, while my re-election to office was conclusive evidence that I had the confidence of the school section.

Yours truly,
R. H. STINSON.

Meaford Road.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. W. J. Cooey has rented Mr. Samuel Lacky's farm for a term of years.

Mr. E. Brodie is farming the place lately owned by Mr. Cooey.

Mr. A. Johnston has the contract for delivering at the Flesherton cheese factory the milk from this route this year.

Messrs. G. Warling and J. Brodie are at work framing Mr. J. I. Graham's new barn.

Mr. W. Gilbert is at work again. He says that he can just discern light with the eye that he got hurt.

A portion of the flume of Mr. E. Davis' saw mill is down. This will cause a great loss to Messrs. Davis & Anderson as the supply of water is greatest at this season of the year.

In consequence of the unusually fine weather spring seeding is pretty well advanced and vegetation is making rapid progress. The prospects of the fruit crop are excellent at present. Fall wheat is looking well.

Trout fishing is now in season and the small boy and large may be met at all hours of the day with hook and line and, well we will say nothing about fish.

Holland Centre.

From our own correspondent.

Mr. John Crowther has his new house on the verge of completion; also Frank Shunn a very handsome house. We may reasonably look for a job for Holland Centre band.

Mr. A. Colquet has commenced building on his town lot. Building operations are quite brisk.

Mr. James Freeborn has leased his farm and moved into our town.

Mr. Andrew Crofford has a cow 18 years old which has had 18 calves; a pair when two years old, and one each year since.

Putting up signs is all the rage here; it's all right if they don't get a racket on Hallow-E'en.

Word has just reached us that on Sunday night Peter Bruce, son of James Bruce of this township, narrowly escaped burning to death in Owen Sound. The building he occupied as a grocery store took fire while he and a shoemaker who roomed with him slept upstairs, Bruce jumped out of a window in his night clothes and thus saved his life, while his unfortunate room mate perished in the flames.

Mr. Lyman Anderson has commenced building his new shingle factory on the lot recently purchased from Mr. John Crowther. He has the boiler laid down and intends putting a lot of new machinery in. He has also two comfortable dwelling houses about complete which adds much to that portion of the village.

Rev. D. Perry has sold his horse, buggy and harness and intends moving to Toronto after conference. His failing health compels him to superannuate at least for a time.

Mr. Stewart Doyle was thrown from a car while loading telegraph poles, he had his wrist put out of joint and otherwise shaken up, but is now able to about again.

Disastrous Fire at Hull.

NEARLY $200,000 WORTH OF PROPERTY LICKED UP BY THE FLAMES.

Hull, Que., May 9.—A disastrous fire visited this place last night. All the buildings on the east side of Duke street and along one side of Philemon street are destroyed, as well as the new post-office on main street. The real value of the building destroyed is estimated at about $125,000. There are 110 buildings divided into 155 tenements, and in these probably 175 or 200 families resided. In the stores on main street a lot of stock was destroyed. The total loss may safely be placed at $175,000 or $200,000 on which there is very little insurance.—[World.

It does not require constant use—one application is effectual. One bottle will remove more pain than any other remedy in existence. Try it for Neuralgia, Toothache, Headache, Rheumatism. Song of Young Canada.

Let others talk of Albion's fame,
Or Scotia's prowess praise,
Let others chant Hibernia's name,
Or swell the "Marseillaise";
A mightier land 'tis ours to boast,
A land more vast, more free;
From ocean coast to ocean coast,
Bound only by the sea!

Fair Canada, our native land,
Our hopes are fixed on thee;
We're working out with heart and hand
Thy glorious destiny.

We do not boast ancestral lines,
We want no nobles here;
Here pride of blood to worth resigns—
Each man is born a peer.
No tyrant king o'er us holds sway,
All unjust laws we hate;
We champion the better way—
A democratic state.

Fair Canada, etc.

In thee unite two nations strong,
Four peoples most renowned;
The rose and thistle here belong,
The shamrock's with them found;
While France's lilies, pure and white,
Quebec's proud temples wreathe—
But best and grandest in our sight
Stands out the Maple Leaf.

Fair Canada, etc.

Should ever danger threaten thee
From rash invading foe,
Should dastard traitor's hand e'er be
Upraised to work thee woe,
Thy sons would rise, from where the sun
Gilds Nova Scotia's shore
To where Columbia's rivers run—
And save their land once more.

Fair Canada, etc.

Ontario's sons—a noble band—
Quebeck's—no aliens they—
New Brunswick's and Prince Edward's Isla's,
To thee all honor pay.
From Manitoba's prairies free,
From our Northwest domain,
The home of millions yet to be,
We hear the same refrain.

Fair Canada, our native land,
Our hopes are fixed on thee;
We're working out with heart and hand
Thy glorious destiny.

WM. BROWN.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Our Brass Band was out in full force on Saturday evening last and made the welkin ring with a few very stirring tunes. Thanks, boys.

There was considerable excitement in the north end of the town on Monday last over the loss of a little child three years old, belonging to Walter Woods. The child was missed from the house about 8 o'clock in the morning, and after considerable search by the parents and no trace of the child to be found, the alarm was given when a turn out of the neighbors was made, going in all directions. About 12 o'clock at noon the little fellow was found stuck in the mud by the side of a swamp on Mr. George Stewart's farm. The day being very wet and cold the poor child was almost perished when found.

The Cattle Fair on Monday last was not as largely attended as usual. A limited number of cows changed hands, but at very low prices, $17 50 being bid for new milch cows; those who were pressed for funds closed at the offer: but most of those having cows out returned them to the farm again.

Mr. J. G. Anderson, one of our most respected young men, who has been in the employ of Mr. M. Richardson, merchant, for nearly four years past has closed his engagement there and is now taking a holiday at home with his parents. Mr. Anderson, during his position here, in the large circle of his acquaintance in this part of the country, made many warm friends. In his business relations with the public, his ready hand, pleasant and genial manner, and sterling principle, won for him the esteem of all. In whatever course he may map out for the future we wish him the success and blessing that attends the man who puts his trust in God.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Afflictions, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. Noyes, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, N. Y.

The People's Cyclopedia.

The people's cyclopedia of universal knowledge is one of the most valuable books of the day. For practical purposes it is as valuable as larger sets of the kind which often contain great amount of verbiage and unnecessary matter, while the cost is much less than these more pretentious publications.

In this age of multifarious reading many people are in danger of reading much useless, or worse than useless, matter. That cannot be said of volumes. They are full of information, covering every department of History, Biography, Science, Art and Social Economy, a complete library in themselves.

Farmers, merchants, professional men, and almost all classes of people will find profit and instruction by consulting this work for information on all matters within the range of human knowledge.

As a work of reference it will be found of inestimable value, and will frequently supersede the necessity of laborious and unsatisfactory search through many volumes of separate authorship.

The illustrations are fine and abundant, the print clear, the paper and binding good, and the general arrangement of the work excellent.

We cordially recommend the work as one which every intelligent family ought to possess.

A PLEASING DUTY.

"I feel it my duty to say," writes John Green, of Desert P. Q., "that Burdock Blood Bitters cured my wife of liver complaint, after which she had been a chronic sufferer. Distressing, painful symptoms soon gave way, and I can highly recommend the Bitters to all suffering as she did."

ONE DOLLAR AGAINST FIVE HUNDRED.

Isaac Brown, of Bothwell, Ont., was afflicted with chronic humors in the blood. Burdock Blood Bitters, a one dollar bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters, was worth more than $500.00 paid for other medicines. It is a reliable blood purifier.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

The Art of Dish-Washing.

It is hard, writes Mrs. C. T. Herrick, to make dish-washing poetical. Still, even ordinary mortals, by dint of giving the same amount of thought to this that they would to some more highly esteemed occupations, can convert it into something totally different from the unsavery business into which it degenerates when left to the hands of careless or ill-trained servants. It would seem almost gratuitous to mention plenty of really hot water as an essential for the proper purifying of utensils, were it not that one is too frequently convinced, from cloudy glass, streaky china, or dull silver, that their latest bath had been of extremely moderate temperature. With water just off the boil, good soap, and an abundance of towels, there is no reason why stoneware and pressed glass should not be as attractive in their dainty cleanliness as French china and cut crystal.

Nearly every household has some favorite preparation for brightening silver and brasses. Among those which accomplish this without injuring the articles to which they are applied may be mentioned: Fir silver, silver soap and electro-silicon. No pomade will servefor cleaning vases or trays of Benares or other finely engraved brass. Nor should they be touched by a brush. The delicate etching is too easily effaced or clogged to be subjected to any but the gentlest handling. Wash the ornament in clean hot water and then rub thoroughly with a bit of soft cloth; an old handkerchief is best dipped in lemon juice. Wipe dry and polish with chamois skin. Benares brasses are especially apt to lose their brightness readily from the dust settling in the interstices of the closely engraved surface.

To clean copper the old-fashioned mixture of vinegar and salt, followed by an application of sifted ashes, does better than anything else. The final friction with chamois skin or soft flannel should never be omitted.

Even in our enlightened age, and among people who ought to know better, the practice of "draining" dishes is less uncommon than it should be. Servants do it almost invariably, unless closely watched. It is a puzzling question why it should be considered easier to wipe a pile of plates and cups that have all been drawn from the water at once than to dry each article singly while it is still so hot that it needs but a few touches of the towel to make it bright.

The towels themselves are not the least important of the means to the end of washing dishes properly. They require care to prevent their becoming greasy and malodorous. While washing soda should never be used in any department of laundry work, the addition of a couple of tablespoonfuls of ammonia to the suds in which dish towels are scrubbed does no harm, and assists materially in the removal of dirt. The towels should never be boiled until washed thoroughly. Otherwise boiling sets the stains.

Notes for Housekeepers.

People who pay allegiance to fashion are dyeing their white lace window curtains with some shade of yellow.

TIN BUTTER-BOWLS.—A correspondent of the National Stockman recommends tin butter-bowls, affirming that, with all possible care, the wooden ones will become tainted and spoil the butter.

CLEANING BRASS AND COPPER VESSELS.—Brass or copper vessels used for stewing fruits should be polished while warm, as they are easier cleaned to say nothing of the pleasure to find them ready for use.

APPLE BATTER PUDDING. One quart of milk, four eggs, one pint of flour, one small teaspoonful salt, three or four large tart apples cut fine and stirred into the batter last. Boil or bake it for one hour. Eat with sauce.

LIQUID SAUCE (FOR PUDDINGS).—Two tablespoons butter, one cup of sugar and yolks of two eggs beaten together, just before wanted pour on slowly two cups boiling water and stir until dissolved. Flavor with a little grated nutmeg and three tablespoons Catawba syrup which comes in bottles, or strawberry syrup if preferred.

FISH BALLS.—Cut up eight good sized potatoes and pick fine one pint of salt codfish. Put all in cold water and boil until tender enough to strain through a colander; add a piece of butter the size of an egg, a little cream and one egg; salt if needed. Mash all together and fry in boiling hot fat. Use a spoonful for each ball, dipping the spoon in cold water to prevent the mixture from sticking to the spoon.

WIRE-RING DISHCLOTH.—Many good house-wives have no knowledge of the excellence of a bunch of wire rings (to be had for a reasonable price at any house-furnishing store) in cleaning pots, skillets, etc., particularly if the latter should happen to get scorched. A piece of sandpaper will also be found very serviceable in rubbing off patches of "burned-on" food and it doesn't injure the glazed surface of the kettle.

POTATO ROLLS.—Boil six good-sized potatoes with their jackets; take them out with a skimmer, drain and squeeze with a towe to insure being dry; then remove the skin, mash them perfectly free from lumps, add a tablespoonful of butter, the yolks of three eggs and a pint of sweet milk. When coo beat in a teaspoonful of yeast. Put in just enough flour to make a stiff dough. When this rises make into small cakes. Let them rise the same as biscuit, and bake a delicate brown.

A Home-Made Telephone.

To make a serviceable telephone from one farmhouse to another, only requires enough wire and two cigar boxes. First select your boxes, and make a hole about half an inch in diameter in the centre of the bottom of each, and then place one in each of the houses you wish to connect. Then get five pounds of common iron stovepipe wire, make a loop in one end, and put it through the hole in your cigar box, and fasten it with a nail. Then draw it tight to the other box, supporting it, when necessary, with a stout cord. You can easily run your line into the house by boring a hole through the glass. Support your boxes with slats nailed across the window, and your telephone is complete. The writer has one that is 200 yards long, and cost forty five cents, that will carry music, when the organ is playing thirty feet a i another room.

FOREIGN ECHOES.

Madame Albini will sang the ode by Tennyson at the opening of the Indian and Colonial exhibition in London.

It is reported that King Louis of Bavaria, has become bankrupt, and a regency will be declared.

The oldest merchant vessel afloat is said to be the bark True Love, which was built in Philadelphia in 1764, and is, therefore, 122 years old. She is still in active service, and is owned by J. S. Ward of London.

A Baptist missionary in China writes home that what an American family throws away in a year would keep a dozen Chinese families; and what a Chinese family throws away in the same time would not feed a mouse.

As an example of the eccentricities of British elections, the London Globe gives this as a result of the contest at Ipswich: "An English borough rejects two Englishmen and elects two Scotchmen on a question of Irish policy."

House rent is so high in the city of Mexico that many houses are vacant in the older quarters of the city, newcomers nearly all seeking the suburbs, especially toward the west. Landlords do not come down, however, preferring to wait, since their property is not taxed when unoccupied.

The plan of throwing a bridge over the Straits of Messina, that separate Sicily from Italy, will when consummated, be one of the most striking feats of modern engineering. The place selected is where the channel is two and one-half miles wide and 361 feet deep, and two piers will support a viaduct of steel rails to a height of 328 feet above the water.

The Egyptian Sphinx is soon to get a thorough overhauling. A company has been formed in Paris to aid M. Maspero in carrying on his excavations. It is thought that the Sphinx is a tomb, and that under it or inside of it some valuable and interesting material may be discovered that will add a few years more to the length of history. The work will be carried on with care, so that the great Sphinx may not be disfigured by the somewhat tardy autopsy.

A life insurance company in England bears the amazing title of "The Royal Liver Friendly Society." Its mission is not, as might naturally be supposed, the insuring of persons afflicted with or liable to hepatic disorders, but general, like all other life insurance companies. Indeed, it would seem that it rather seeks to ignore, if it does not actually contemn, the functional service of that important organ after which it is named, since in a recent manifesto its officers assure the public that "no longer there will be a secretive atmosphere in the affairs of the society."

Various trials of the new French horse-shoe, which is made entirely of sheep's horn, are said to show its particular adaptedness for horses employed in towns, and known not to have a steady foot on the pavement. The results of the experiments are therefore regarded as very satisfactory, horses thus shod having been driven at a rapid pace on such pavement without slipping. Besides this advantage, the new shoe is spoken of as more durable, and, though a little more expensive than the ordinary kind, seems destined sooner or later, to replace the iron shoe.

The unusual severity of the past winter gave Englishmen an opportunity of indulging in many sports common to colder countries, but rarely enjoyed there. Skating has been general, and during the week that followed the new year many toboggans and sleighs were seen in and about the vicinity of London; but all these amusements were eclipsed by a man who built an ice yacht and was able to sail in it for two weeks in January on the frozen surface of the Reading reservoir, to the delight of the whole neighborhood.

The will of Kate Rowsand, the little dwarf that was known all over Europe as "Madame la Marquise," contains a novel feature. After she had disposed of all her property, there remained her wardrobe. "Well," said she, "my dresses and linen and every thing that I wore must be far too small for the littlest child; but, in order that some poor little girl may be happy, I desire that the sum of ten pounds sterling may be applied to the purchase of twenty dolls of my size, which shall all be dressed from my wardrobe and given to orphans."

The German ship Auguste, belonging to Bremerhaven, and bound for Hong Kong, narrowly escaped falling a prey to some 150 pirates. When not far from her destination she was hailed by a junk, all of whose crew seemed to be unarmed, and were persistent in their efforts to trade with the ship, which had slackened her pace by the wind falling. Presently a number of armed junks swarmed up and began to attack the Auguste. The German crew had to defend themselves vigorously. Five of the pirates were killed and several wounded. A smart breeze sprang up and the German vessel got away without loss.

It is M. Girard, Chief of the municipal laboratory of Paris, who says: "From 1840 to 1850 about 25,000,000 gallons of brandy were made yearly in France, and fully seven-eighths came from grapes. At present more than 50,000,000 gallons are yearly turned out, but not one per cent. of it is made from the grape; grain, cider, beet, potatoes, &c., forming its principal sources. The spirits thus obtained would be fairly wholesome if they were properly rectified. But they are not. Invariably when put upon the market they are charged with acids, ethers, and essentials of oils of the most deadly nature." The startling increase of violent insanity and other maladies in France, in late years, is by M. Girard attributed to consumption of that deadly brandy. We import large quantities of it into this country.

A gentleman who travelled on the Yellow or Heangho River in January last tells how great a source of trouble that river is to the millions who inhabit the central plain of China. Much the same story was told nearly a century ago by Lord Macartney about this most disorderly river. Nine instances are on record of its making a complete change of course. It has moved its mouth from south to north over four degrees of latitude, leaving only sandy wastes and shallow lakes where populous plains had existed. Western engineers have been much interested in the question whether these disastrous overflows and changes of the river bed can be checked. They have been convinced for some years of the feasibility of keeping the river's erratic tendencies within limits, and in the course of human progress "China's sorrow" may some day be robbed of its terrors.

A STRUGGLE TO THE DEATH.

In a Locomotive Cab with a Mad Engineer.

I was in the second years of my apprenticeship as fireman on No. 63. of the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton Road, when I got such a set back one night as few firemen ever lived through. The incident happened about fifteen years ago, but every feature of it comes to my mind as clear as if the affair occurred last night. My engineer was named Bob Ripley. He was a jovial, whole-souled fellow, never going behind a glass of beer, and was known all along the line as a sober and trusty man.

Well, all of a sudden, bad luck struck him. He had a little home, which was taken away by a land shark. He left Cincinnati one night for Toledo on his usual run, and returned to find his wife dead. She had some heart trouble, and died without a moment's warning. Within a fortnight his boy baby sickened and died, and that left Bob without home or family. I tell you it made an awful change on him. He was off for two or three weeks, and when he came back to the cab I could scarcely recognize him. He had a wild, queer look to his eyes, a strange sound to his voice, and he was so sullen and morose that I almost feared to speak to him on matters of business. I made two or three trips with him, and but for the fear of hurting his feelings I should have made application to be changed.

It was the third or fourth trip after he returned to the road when we left Cincinnati one November night for the north. It was a wild, stormy night, and as we got out into the country I caught Bob smiling and chuckling. The wildness of the night seemed to strike a responsive chord in his soul. Old '63 seemed to be in uncommon spirits, too, for she was gliding along with a heavy train, and making no fuss over it. I made some remarks about it, but Bob had no reply. Indeed, he acted as if he was alone in the cab. I didn't like the situation a bit, for I had a suspicion that he wasn't quite right in his head, and he was also spurring her beyond schedule time. We were to pass a side-tracked accommodation about thirty miles out of Cincinnati. She ought to be in eight minutes ahead of our time, but 63 was overreaching schedule time so fast that I feared a collision. The conductor had his eyes open, however, and at a stop about twenty miles out he came forward and cautioned Bob to slow her down. We had overreached five minutes in that short run. Bob answered surly enough, but as we pulled out again he obeyed orders and checked her down to lose the extra minutes gained.

We had passed the siding all right when I noticed that his nervousness increased. He would whistle for crossings where none existed, and he would toot suppositions cattle off the track. Once, seeming to ignore my presence altogether, he opened the furnace door and piled in the fuel, although we were carrying more steam than I had ever seen on.

At Hamilton I was fully resolved to speak to the conductor if he came forward and gave me opportunity, but he did not. It was when I returned to the cab after oiling up that Bob looked up at me with a start, as if surprised to see me, and said:

"Jim, I'm thinking of them."

"Yes, Bob, but they are better off," I soothingly said. "You must bear up like a man. It's sad enough, God knows, but you must meet it bravely."

"Did you see——?"

"What?" I asked as he suddenly checked himself.

He did not answer. He looked at his watch signalled me to ring the bell, and in a moment more we were off. The night was growing wilder, and we were not ten minutes out of Hamilton when I made up my mind that there was trouble close at hand. Bob turned to look at me now and then in a way to prove that he meditated evil, and from the way he kept the whistle going the passengers behind must have supposed the track to be swarming with living obstructions. We were about half way to Dayton and I had just replenished the fire, when Bob suddenly gave her all steam. It seemed to me as if old 63 took a clean jump of ten feet as she felt the extra steam, and I shouted my alarm. The words were hardly uttered before he was upon me.

"You've got to die with me!" he screamed as he clutched my arms, and I'm not exaggerating a bit when I tell you that his eyes looked like coals of fire.

I was by far the stronger man of the two, but in his first rush he dashed me about in a dreadful way, and had almost pulled me to the steps before I called up my muscle. Then I did my best to save him. He was bound to go off, and I was bound to prevent, it and as we pulled and tugged at each other, the train was running so close to a mile a minute that none of the passengers cared to reduce the fraction. I think our struggle lasted about five minutes. I was gradually drawing him back into the tender, and was wondering how I could secure him, when he suddenly shut his teeth on my right wrist, and bit and tore like a dog. I had to let go my clutch, and as I did so he turned and leaned off, uttering a cry which rang in my ears for weeks after.

It was high time the steam was shut off. As I afterward learned, every passenger was hanging on and praying to heaven, for the dullest of them knew that something had happened on the locomotive. I brought her to a stand-still as soon as possible, and when the conductor reached the cab we backed up to look for poor Bob's body. We found it about two miles back, and it was a shocking sight. He had struck a stump head first, and head and face were simply a bloody mass of flesh.

I ran the train into Dayton and we had scarcely come to a standstill before I was seized with a chill, and had to be helped to the hotel. I was just clean broken down under mental strain, and it was plump six weeks before I crept out of my bed. I was determined never to step foot on an engine, but when health came back I got my nerve again, and the result was that I finished my apprenticeship, and took the other side of the cab.

A SIBERIAN RAILROAD.

The Completion of the Canadian Pacific Alarms Russia.

A St. Petersburg despatch says:—The completion of the Canadian Pacific railway has given a fresh incitement to the discussion among Russians of their own long talked of line to the Pacific across Siberia to Vladivostock. If Russia has stolen a march over England in railway progress towards Herat, it will be a long time before the Russian locomotives compete with those of England and America in reaching the shores of the Pacific. The branch to Tiumen has not yet been made, and the Ufa Zlatoust section to Ekaterinburg has only lately been decided upon, after years of dispute over the conflicting claims of different towns. Yet the almost chimerical idea of a Russian Pacific railroad is already talked of and written about as an undertaking of early and easy accomplishment. The other day a meeting of the society for furthering Russian trade and commerce, under the presidency of Count Ignatieff, was enlightened on the subject by a discussion of several projects for the great work, among them being a curious one tendered by an enterprising exile living in Siberian banishment. All difficulties were very satisfactorily disposed of except one, which was quite left out of calculation, and that was the source of the 150,000,000 roubles and more that would be required for the enterprise. The addition of the Canadian Pacific railway to that of the United States naturally makes the Russians feel more keenly than ever the disadvantages of their isolated position on the Amoor and the Pacific coast.

The Value of Salt.

Severe pains in the bowels and stomach are often speedily relieved by the application of a bag of hot salt. A weak solution of salt and water is recommended by good physicians as a remedy for imperfect digestion, and for a cold in the head it is a complete cure snuffed from the hollow of the hand. We have known severe cases of catarrh entirely cured by persistent use of this simple remedy every night and morning for several months, when the best of efforts of the best physicians failed to do any good. It should be used milk-warm. A good handful of rock salt added to the bath is the next best thing after an "ocean dip," and a gargle of a weak solution is a good and ever-ready remedy for a sore throat. As a dentifrice, salt and water is very cleansing, and also hardens the gums. It will also prevent the hair from falling out. When broiling steak, throw a little salt on the coals, and the blaze from the dripping fat will not annoy. A little in starch, boiled or raw, will prevent the irons from sticking. If the irons are rough, put a little salt on a thick brown paper, lay a piece of thin muslin over it, and rub the iron over it till perfectly smooth. Ink stains are entirely removed by the immediate application of dry salt before the ink has dried. When the salt becomes discolored by absorbing the ink, brush it off and apply more; wet slightly. Continue this till the ink is all removed. If new calicoes are allowed to lie in strong salt water for an hour before the first washing, the colors are less likely to fade. Damp salt will remove the discoloration of cups and saucers caused by tea and careless washing. A teaspoonful of salt in each kerosene lamp makes the oil give a much clearer, better light.

A Royal Printer.

It is not generally known that Prince Ludwig of Battenberg, son of Prince Alexander of Hesse, is a practical printer. Like most of the princes of the Prussian Royal House, who have been taught either art or a trade, Prince Ludwig of Battenberg was early called upon to choose a calling, and his choice fell upon the art of Guttenberg. In the palace of his father the Prince has a printing office completely fitted up for ordinary printing and book-work. Prince Ludwig prides himself on his ability to compete with compositors and printers who follow typography for a livelihood. What is still more interesting is that the Princess, the eldest daughter of the Grand Duke of Hesse, is a printer, too, and that, the high-born pair work regularly together at the case. The latest work which has come from Prince Ludwig of Battenberg's press is a volume of notes on travels written by the Prince's sister, the Countess of Erbach-Schonberg. The book is said to be executed in a thoroughly printer-like way.

How to Advertise.

A contemporary, in some "hints on advertising," says: "Another thing which publishers have to contend with is that the results of advertising are not always visable to patrons, many of whom can not understand why custom can not be directly traced to the source where they expended their money to obtain it. Business is like a river with many tributaries, and in which it is impossible to trace every individual drop of water to the spring from whence it came. But if a journal is selected for advertising purposes that reaches time and again the persons most likely to be interested in the solicitation, that paper is certainly a sure fountain-head of profitable trade in the stream of patronage far below. Temporary advertisements in a small way will not produce an immediate or permanent increase of business, any more than a light shower will affect the depth of water in a well, but by persistency in the use of printer's ink in the right direction, the result sought will be gained in the end with interest.

Jupiter.

The distance of Jupiter from the sun is 480,000,000 miles. It is next in brightness to Venus, and may be seen in daytime in clear weather from a mountain top. It is about 300 times the weight of the earth, and has 1,200 times the bulk of the earth. It reflects nearly one-half the light that falls upon it.

Sudden Wealth.

Old Gentleman (to tramp, to whom he has just given a nickle)—Now, my friend, what will you do with all that money?

Tramp (gazing awe struck at the nickle)—I think I'll put part of it in the bank, sir, and the rest I'll spend for a peach-blow vase.

YOUNG FOLKS.

KOOMANA.

BY W. H. GILDER.

The first important gift I received after becoming a resident of an Esquimaux village in North Hudson Bay was a boy. He was a bright, handsome lad, about twelve years old, whom I had often particularly noticed for a manly and dignified bearing. His name was Koomana. That was expressive and pretty, but when later I learned its meaning the name lost that pleasing quality which in my unenlightened state I had much admired. All Esquimau names have some meaning. Usually a person is named after some object. One man (or woman, for there is no distinction of gender) will be called "Wolf," another "Seal," another "Salmon," and a man who joined our party in King William's Land was named Ookeeur, which means first finger, but sometimes by way of joke the others would call him "Potowock," signifying great toe. The boy's name, Koomana, means lousy, but in this case it was a misnomer, as he was particular cleanly—for an Esquimau. His parents were pleased that he had found favor with one of the white men, and the day formally presented him to me, in return I gave the father a handful of powder and a few percussion caps, and the mother half a dozen needles. The boy moved into our tent and was fed from our table, but I noticed that he never took the rough edge off of his appetite on the pile of reindeer or walrus meat in the parents' tent.

In the course of a few days I reached the conclusion that if I could not alter his name I might, at least, change the condition which seemed to make it appropriate by giving him a new suit of clothes. There was a difficulty now arising from the fact that all our clothing came from what is called the "slop-cask" of a whaler. It had been designed for full-grown men. In all Esquimau-land there were no tailors or seamstresses who could fashion and sew woolen clothes. So I was constrained to exercise my own ingenuity with scissors and needle, and alter some clothes so that our adopted son might be clad in civilized garments. It was a change that he long desired, and no boy in the civilized world ever attended with greater zest the hour when he might don trousers and coat than that artless savage waited for his first woolen suit. The material was rough sailor's cloth, and the cut and stitches would scarcely pass muster in a ready-made clothing store, but it was a great feat for me to accomplish, and Koomana and I regarded the garments with unspeakable pride.

Before he donned his new suit I began to take him into my tent and give him a bath as used to commemorate the Saturday afternoon of my childhood. But finding that these people never wash I was afraid to run the risk and omitted the bathing experiment. The next day I heard Frank Melms, one of our party, call Koomana, as he handed him a piece of brown soap, that I would like him better if he washed his face and hands. And so went the lad to the nearest puddle, and soon came running into the tent breathless from exercise, and turned his smiling face upward to me for inspection and approval. Then it was that I realized what an effort he had made to please me. His face was clean and shiny, while around it, at the roots of his hair and on his neck, the newly applied suds lay thick on the black grease and dirt that had not been reached by the cleansing process.

Poor child, he had done the best he could to please me, and at what cost of suffering was evident in his blood-shot eyes which the suds had invaded through his unskilled manipulation.

Koomana was an excellent hunter for a dog driver for his age, and had a record of five seals killed on the ice, which was more than the next best score among the boys of his tribe, even including several years his senior. He had also killed five reindeer, and had vanquished all competitors of his age in their own races. Although my boy had a man's arms, his arms were those of a child, and consequently a gun with the ordinary stock was awkward for him to handle. I therefore made for him a small and effective magazine rifle by replacing the stock of a large Smith & Wesson pistol with one which I cut out of a black walnut board and made into a short gun-stock which he could use with facility. With this new weapon Koomana contributed three reindeer to our general stock of provisions while on the journey to King William's Land and return. Wherever I went, whether on sledge journeys or hunting excursions, Koomana was always my little companion. I enjoyed his society while profiting by his knowledge of Esquimau craft; therefore it is not strange that we grew very fond of each other, and our parting was a great trial to both of us. Koomana was drowned the year after I left Hudson Bay, and when I return it will seem like the same place without him.

The Angelus.

BY FRANCES L. MACE.

Ring soft across the dying day,
Angelus!
Across the amber-tinted bay,
The meadow flushed with sunset ray;
Ring out, and float, and melt away,
Angelus.

The day of toil seems long ago,
Angelus;
While through the deepening vesper glow
Far up where holy lilies blow,
Why beckoning bell-notes rise and flow,
Angelus.

Through dazzling curtains of the west,
Angelus,
We see a shrine in roses dressed,
And lifted high in vision blest,
Our every heart-throb is confessed,
Angelus.

Oh has an angel touched the bell,
Angelus?
For now upon its parting swell
All sorrow seems to sing farewell,
There falls a peace no words can tell
Angelus!

There's a new cemetery out West that is rushing up trade in lots by advertising gains in misfit graves.

"Mamma," cried a five year old girl, "I started to make my doll a bonnet and it's come out a pair of pants."

Three French Marriages.

I was present recently at a wedding-mass in the church of St. Thomas d'Aquin in the faubourg St. Germain, Paris. In the square before the church ladies in elegant costume were descending from their carriages and mounting the steps, where a rich carpet was laid for them, as one would see in New York on a similar occasion. At the door stood the vergers in white hose and scarlet knee-breeches, with blue coat, gold-embroidered waistcoats, and the picturesque three-cornered hat trimmed with light gray ostrich feathers. While awaiting the arrival of the bridal carriage I took a survey of the church, wh'ch was built by the Dominicans near the close of the seventeenth century, and during the first revolution was occupied by the Theophilanthropists. It was richly decorated, like most Roman Catholic churches, where art seems to lavish all its resources. Some one has called Art the handmaid of Religion, but she seems often to forget this subordinate position, and to arrogate for herself a principle in the house of God. I noticed particularly a marble group of Saint Vincent de Paul with an infant in his arms and an older child at his feet, and a Descent from the Cross.

At length the bridal party entered, preceded by the vergers with their glittering halberds. The bride was leaning on the arm of her father, while the bridegroom conducted her mother. They were attended by several bridesmaids and groomsmen, and followed by a long train of relatives and friends. Passing up the main aisle, they took their seats in the enclosed space before the high altar, the bride and bridegroom in the centre, apart from the rest, in chairs of crimson velvet and gold, rich enough for princes. There was a profusion of white flowers around the altar, but they were all artificial, as seems to be always the case in France on such occasions. Though they are exquisite imitations, one would perfer to have real flowers at one's wedding. More than sweetness is a bad omen.

The officiating priest and his assistants wore white robes, with lace which would have made the despair of a duchess. The bride looked very graceful in a white gown perfectly plain, with the tulle veil floating over her feet and orange blossoms gleaming out from her dark ringlets. The ceremony was long and impressive. In one part of it the priest presented to the bride and bridegroom the "pieces de marriage"—that is, silver medals about the size of a dollar bearing the names of the young couple, with the date of their marriage and appropriate emblems. A little later they advanced toward the altar, where the priest presented to them two golden paterie, which they reverently kissed, and, returning to their seats, two of the groomsmen held above their heads a long white mantle of cloth of silver with fringes of gold, while the priest went on with the service.

During the offertory the vergers passed through the assembly with their monotonous chant, "Pour les pauvres, s'il vous plait" ("For the poor, if you please"), each followed by a groomsman and a bridesmaid, who held out the small crimson velvet bag to receive the offerings. I would rather have taken part in the charge at Gettysburg than do this myself, but the perfect ease and grace of these young French girls made it charming.

At the close of the mass the bridal party passed around the altar into the sacristy, when they received the congratulations of their friends, afterward returning through the grand aisle of the church in the same order as they had entered, except that the bride now leaned on the arm of her husband, while the organ pealed forth exultingly the "Wedding March" of Mendelssohn.

As we came out of the church my friend, Madame Lefort, said to me, "You have seen what is very rare in France, a marriage of love and inclination, a l Americain. It is the only one I have ever known."

"And your own, madame?" said I.

"Mine has been a happy marriage, but I was not acquainted with M. Lefort when I was married to him. The first time I ever saw him was on the day of rejoicing at the birth of the prince imperial. He was presented to me in the Champs-Elysees, but I was engrossed with the scene around me and did not much observe him. 'How did you like M. Lefort?' asked my mother on the way home. 'I do not know; I scarcely looked at him.' 'But, my daughter, your father has selected him for your husband. He will dine with us to-morrow, and unless he is very disagreeable to you—' M. Lefort was a handsome man; he is so still, you know, and he was much handsomer then. He pleased me, but I never spoke ten words to him till after we were married, which was just a month from the day I first saw him; and all the time we were so busy, my mother and I, with preparations for the wedding that I had not a moment to think. He sent me the most beautiful flowers every day, and for my corbeille de mariage he gave me diamonds and an India shawl which cost five thousand francs. He was in a state to commit follies then," said madame with a little sigh. "I was bewildered with all this new splendor, for French girls are always dressed in the simplest way—not at all as in your country, where miss has everything as handsome as mamma—and they never go into the street without a chaperone. I was full of life and longed for excitement; my mother was an invalid and went out very seldom, so that marriage was like an open door to freedom."

"But I do not see how you dared."

"Oh, as to that. I was thoughtless enough, and besides I never expected anything different. Eugene was very good to me; by and bye we had our little Clarice, we fell in love with each other by degrees, and we have been very happy. I think marriages are as happy in France as anywhere else. I helped to make three last winter, and they have all been happy."

"Do tell me about them," said I.

"With the greatest pleasure, this evening after dinner."

"The girls will like to hear the story too," said I. (The girls were four charming specimens of American young womanhood who were under my care temporarily.)

Accordingly, when the lamps were lighted (for there is no gas in French parlors) we drew our chairs around the table to hear the story of the three marriages.

"You remember," began madame, "the fat colonel who dined with us last Sunday. His wife is my cousin, and a year ago she was not Madame de Courcelles."

"But the little boy?" said Alice with a naive surprise in her blue eyes.

"Oh, the colonel was a widower," said madame, laughing. "My cousin lived with her father in a country town. She was the youngest child. Her mother had been dead many years; her brothers and sisters were married; she had been asked in marriage, but she did not like to leave her father, and he would have been so desolate without her that he had not the heart to urge it. My uncle died about two years ago; his property was divided among his children. Pauline had a moderate income, which would not permit her to live in the style to which she was accustomed. She wrote me a very sad letter, lamenting her father's death and her own loneliness and desolation. She asked me to find her a room and board in Paris, in a convent or in some quiet family. I wrote that I would do all I could for her. 'But, my dear cousin,' I added, 'why do you not think of marriage? It will be very disagreeable to you, who have so long been the mistress of a handsome establishment, to live in the way you propose. Seriously, marriage is the only solution of all your perplexities.' I had not long to wait for a reply. Pauline wrote that she would willingly marry, but she was now thirty-six years old, her dowry was not excessive, and she feared it would be impossible to make an advantageous marriage. 'Difficult,' I wrote in reply, 'but not impossible. Come to Paris, make me a little visit, and we will see.' Now I had in mind my friend Colonel de Courcelles, whose wife had been dead about a year and a half. He often came to see me, and always bewailed his loneliness and the unhappy condition of his children (he had but two, a girl and boy) without a mother. It occurred to me that two sorrows rightly mingled might make one joy; and the next time he called and entered on his usual monologue I interpolated the question, 'Why don't you marry again, colonel? It is the only thing that can make you forget your sorrows.' 'I know it,' said he, 'but there is no lady.' 'Pardon me, colonel. I have a cousin who is just my age. She has recently lost her father; she has a dowry of fifty thousand francs, and she is coming to spend a few weeks with me.' 'I shall be delighted to meet your charming cousin, madame.'

"In due time Pauline arrived. After the first greeting and condolences were over, I said, 'Pauline, I think I have found a husband for you—Colonel de Courcelles. I have been acquainted with him many years; he has a fine position, and he was very indulgent to his wife; she was very happy with him. He will dine with us on Sunday, and you will have an opportunity to see him. I have said nothing to him about it; you may feel completely at your ease.'"

(My Canadian readers, who have been brought up, I hope, with a strict regard for truth, will doubtless be shocked at madame's want of veracity. I was not sorry to see my young friends exchange a glance of surprise, which madame did not observe, and would not have understood if she had observed it. Frenchmen appear to regard a lie as a thing innocent in itself—one which may be even highly meritorious, and which becomes criminal only under certain circumstances, deriving its moral character entirely from the motives that prompt it.)

"On Sunday the colonel came. Clarice was at school then, and there were only four of us—M. Lefort and I, my cousin and the colonel, who sat opposite her. They looked at each other furtively from time to time, and when their eyes met dropped them instantly on their plates in the most comical manner. Dinner over, I took my cousin aside: 'What do you think of him?' 'He is too fat,' said Pauline. 'Fat? You think so? The idea!' 'Oh, madame, how could you? He is immense!' said my innocent Pauline, with a look of distress. 'Only consider what a fine position he has,' said I, 'and such an excellent man! if you could only see how well he looks on horseback at the head of his regiment!'

"Later in the evening I had an opportunity to speak to the colonel. 'Well?' said I, interrogatively. 'Madame, your cousin is charming, but she is rather too tall.' The huge colonel had a giant's penchant for little women. 'There is no occasion for you to go any further,' said I. 'I have not mentioned it to my cousin, of course.' 'I should like to call to morrow,' said he.

"In six weeks Pauline was Madame de Courcelles, but up to the wedding-day she continued to say piteously, 'If he were only not so fat!'"

"That is not romantic at all," said Emily.

"But they are very happy," said madame.

"Doesn't she think he is too fat now?" asked Belle.

"I dare say she would be very indignant if you were to say so," laughed madame.

"Now for marriage Number 2," said Helen.

"A short time before my cousin's marriage," continued madame, "my friend, M. Auber, called on me. 'That is a strange idea of yours, to marry your cousin to that great fat colonel,' said he; 'I have a friend who would suit her much better, I am sure.' 'It is rather late for that now; she is to be married in ten days.' 'How vexatious!' said M. Auber. 'But, monsieur, I have a sister-in-law, a young widow, several years younger and far handsomer than my cousin. Your friend might be pleased with her.' 'I wish I could see her.' Nothing easier. Dine with us the day after to-morrow, you and madame Auber, and I will invite Julie to meet you.' My sister is really very beautiful, and M. Auber could not retain his admiration: 'Oh, madame, she is adorable! If my friend can please her, he is man to be envied. Let me see; to-day is Tuesday. Well, Thursday, if you and your sister and M. Lefort will dine with us, my friend will be there.'

"Thursday came, the dinner and the guests. I had told my sister what was in contemplation, and we were naturally a little curious to see M. Vernon. He was a good-looking man, about fifty years of age.

"Oh, madame, wasn't he bald?" asked Alice.

"Well, he was a little, on the top of his head."

"I hate bald men. How old was she?"

"A little under thirty."

"I should not think she would have married him if she was so beautiful."

"Well, my dear he had a fine social position and a large fortune, hotel in Paris, house in the country, elegant carriage, and servants in livery. It was a great temptation, and then she was not very young, you know. Well, dinner was over and we had returned to the parlor. M. Auber seemed restless and fidgety, for he is of a very impatient temperament. 'Madame Lefort,' said he, rising, 'I would like to show you a painting by Paul Delaroche in the next room.' I had seen the painting hundreds of times, but I followed without a word. 'Vernon, wouldn't you like to see it too?' said M. Auber. No sooner was the door closed than he asked in his eager way, 'Well, madame, what does your sister think of my friend?' 'But, monsieur, how should I know? I have not had an opportunity to speak to her. Besides, it would be more suitable to know M. Vernon's impression first.' 'Oh, I saw that in an instant,' said M. Auber. 'There is no need of asking him. He is enchanted.' 'Truly, she is the most beautiful creature I ever saw,' said M. Vernon. 'Far too young and lovely for me, I am afraid.' 'That remains to be seen,' said his friend. 'Ask her, madame—just as well now as any time.' 'But M. Vernon must go away.' 'Certainly, madame;' and he opened the door into the parlor. 'Come, then, Julie, don't you wish to see this beautiful painting? Have you no taste for the arts?' She came. 'M. Auber wishes to know how you are pleased with his friend.' 'He is very well,' said she cooly—'rather old.' 'Oh, madame, is that all you can say for one of the best matches in France?' 'I do not know that I have any objection,' she added. 'Then, madame, we will consider the affair settled.'

"Early the next morning M. Vernon called to ask my husband to accompany him to the house of Julie's mother, and after the usual compliments of presentation he immediately asked the hand of her daughter. In three weeks I had the pleasure of being present at the wedding."

"Oh, how dreadful!" cried the girls in a chorus. "No lovemaking!" "No walks by moonlight!' "So prosaic!" "Everything hurried up so, just like a parcel of goods bought and delivered."

"Why, how long are betrothals in your country?" asked madame.

"Two or three years generally. Seldom less than one year when the parties are young."

"I should have changed my mind three or four times in a year," said M. Lefort, looking up from the book which he had been reading all the time, apparently.

"And I mine five times," said madame. "How, then? Are not such long engagements often broken?" she inquired.

"Oh, never!" said Belle with fervor.

"But, my dear child," interrupted I, "I am afraid you are mistaken there: I have known a great many broken in my time."

"And do these young lovers see each other often during this long interval?"

"Very often, madam, if they happen to live near each other."

"But always in the presence of the young lady's mother, I suppose?"

"No; it is very common for a young lady to receive her betrothed alone."

"Oh, shocking!" and madame looked rigid with astonishment. "But if the engagement were broken, she would never find a husband after such an intimacy?"

"That would make no difference," I rejoined, "unless a girl were engaged six or seven years, and the man broke his engagement then, as sometimes happens. She would have lost her fresh young beauty, and her heart might be so set on the faithless lover that no other could ever take his place."

"Ah," said madame, "our young girls are at least saved from all pains of the heart."

"And they are kept from indecorous flirting and manœuvres to attract attention too," said I, with a glance at my young Canadians—not that they needed the hint particularly, however.

"They flirt enough afterward," said Belle spiritedly. "Don't you remember that odious Madame T., with her yellow curls, and the young officer at the Grand Hotel? I never saw any such flirting in America."

"Don't talk, girls," said Emily. "I want to hear about the third marriage."

"Well," resumed madame, "I felt a good deal of complacency in my success, and it formed a subject of conversation at my next reception. 'I am disgusted,' said Madame Belval. 'I have been trying all winter to bring about a marriage between two of my friends, and it has failed at last. I will never try again if I live a thousand years.' 'I am ready to try again to-morrow.' 'Pray be so kind as to give me some assistance, then,' said Madame C., wife of the minister of marine. 'I am looking for a suitable wife for Emile, as I am very desirous that he should marry. Young men are exposed to so many temptations in Paris—actresses and grisettes, and all that kind of thing—enough to drive a mother distracted. Emile will be twenty-five next month.'"

"I should think he was old enough to find a wife for himself," whispered Alice.

"'His salary is twelve thousand francs, which is not bad for a young man, and his father will do something more for him when he marries.' 'I know a girl that will suit him exactly,' cried Madame Belval eagerly, forgetting, like Rip Van Winkle, that she had 'sworn off.'" (This is an interpolation. I am afraid the French ladies had not the pleasure of being acquainted with Monsieur Van Winkle.) "'The administrator of the Lyons Railway has a daughter almost nineteen, the most amiable, the most lovely, and her father will give her a hundred thousand francs.' 'That is very reasonable,' said Madame C. 'I shall be under everlasting obligations to you if you will speak to him of our son.' 'With the greatest pleasure in the world.'

"Madame Belval had an interview with the administrator of railways. He would make inquiries about the young man. The result was satisfactory, and in a week the friends of both families, concluding M. Lefort and myself, received an invitation to a soiree at Madame Belval's, where the two young people would meet for the first time. It was very embarrassing for them in the presence of so many curious observers. Mademoiselle Therese was lovely, with long fair curls and that delicate blonde beauty which is so rare in France. I pitied the poor child, she was so distressed at the thought of being on exhibition, as it were, and looked pale and then flushed alternately."

"I am glad I am not a French girl," said Helen.

"And the young man was scarcely less agitated. They hardly dared to look at each other, and were as silent as deaf-mutes the whole evening. The next day his father made a formal demand of M. Thouvel for the hand of his daughter."

"His father! and the young man had nothing to do with it?" exclaimed Belle, amazed.

"Marriages are always arranged by the parents with us," said madame. "M. Thouvel gave an affirmative answer, and the marriage took place shortly after, as is usual in France."

"And shall you be married in that way, Clarice?" asked Alice compassionately of madame's pretty young daughter.

"How else? I am not going to America."

An additional field of usfulness for the C. P. R. has been indicated from an Imperial point of view. It has been suggested—and the suggeston will probably be acted upon—that an alternative telegraphic cable, entirely under British control, should be laid from England via the Cape of Good Hope to Australia in India. The advantage of this would be that, in case of the obstruction of the Suez route during a war, Britian would have a direct and independent medium of communication with her remote possessions. It is argued that, if the C. P. R.'s wires across this continent were utilized, there would be a saving in distance alone of about 9000 miles, counting the slack wire of the two routes. It is every day more evident that our great railway has before it possibilities of usefulness which it most enthusiastic promoters have not overrated.

A WHOLESALE MURDERER.

The Career of a Bandit who Killed Thirty-two Men.

Adjt-Gen. Taylor of Colorado has in his cabinet, in the Barclay Block, a rude knife sheathed in buckskin, once the property of old Espinosa, the terrible Mexican who killed thirty-two white men, not out of malice nor for the purpose of robbing, but simply because he had a passion for bloodshed. Espinosa was killed by a detachment of First Colorado Cavalry, which was sent from Fort Garland by Col. Sam F. Tappan. The knife was presented to Louis N. Tappan, and by him to the collection in charge of Gen. Taylor. It is an evil-looking weapon, made probably by Espinosa himself, the blade being covered with dark spots, doubtless blood. It is a matter of conjecture on the part of those who see it as to whether this instrument despatched all of the thirty-two victims, a supposition not quite plausible, as the dreadful murderer was known to have been very expert in the use of his gun.

Nothing is known of the early life of Espinosa. He was first discovered selling whiskey to the Indians on the border of Mexico, and was arrested for this unlawful proceeding, the officers intending to make him prisoner. He eluded them, however, made his escape, and was not heard of for some time. About this time dead in that part of Colorado. In the gulches, in the mining camps, among the rocks, in many a sequestered spot, bodies were found which seemed to have been despatched in the most brutal manner. Week after week, month after month, this state of thing went on. The Colorado earth was soaked with blood which reeked in sun and shade. For month no clue could be found to the murderers. The many and frequent deaths were inexplicable. Black mystery hung over the young Territory. People were afraid to venture out after dark, and, in fact, did not feel safe even in the daytime.

After a lapse of long weary months, a Mexican woman one day crossed Baton Pass just above Trinidad, in company with a white man, in an ambulance drawn by mules. Journeying slowly along over the steep rocks, the pair were suddenly surprised by having their horses fired upon and killed. The man succeeded in making his escape in the mountains, but the

by the two Mexicans who had killed the horses. One of the Mexicans was Espinosa. The woman remained in captivity for some time, but finally escaped one dark night and made her way back to her people, who lived just above Trinidad, at Purgoire. During her captivity she had soon fixed the identity of the numerous murderers with which the Territory was ringing. She had studied the man, observed his plans, and was positive that she was right in her conclusion. No sooner had she returned to her people than the news went abroad, and pursuit now became fixed on one Mexican named Espinosa, who was believed to be guilty of all this indiscriminate slaughter.

All this happened in 1862 and '63, Espinosa being heard of in California Gulch, where he was again up to his old tricks of separating the soul from the body. Upon the heels of the murders the minors of California followed fast in hot pursuit of the villain, finally overtaking and of Espinosa's, who ravaged the country under his leadership. Espinosa, however, escaped his pursuers the second time, and was next heard of in the San Luis valley. In the meantime the Territorial Legislature had offered a large reward for him, dead or alive, and several men were out on the search.

Early one autumn morning, just at sunrise, it transpired that Espinosa was camped near Grayback Gulch, in the Sangre de Christo range, on the southwest slope, about twelve miles from Fort Garland. The men in pursuit were on this side of the mountain, feeling sure that Espinosa was somewhere in the region, although they had no idea that they were anywhere in his immediate vicinity. A man whose name is Tom Tobin, still living in the San Luis Valley was the scout in advance of the soldiers. Tobin was known as a dead sure shot, it having been said for years, that he had never aimed at any living thing and missed it. This man, riding cautiously along in the autumn sunrise, was attracted by the smoke of a camp fire in the ravine. Quickly dismounting from his horse, he accompanied by one of the young men in his detachment, until he gained a place where he could see, the first glance revealing two Mexicans leisurely cooking their breakfast in the very heart of the ravine. It needed but an instant for Tobin to see that the grim, copper-visaged old man so carefully broiling his antelope steak on the coals, was none other than Espinosa, who might well have been christened the "Red Handed." Making up his mind in an instant Tobin said to his companion: "I'll shoot at the old man. You aim at the young one!"

CREPT CAUTIOUSLY ALONG,

These instructions, Tobin afterwards explained, were given because he knew his friend was a poor shot, and he felt sure that his own aim was better directed upon Colorado's arch fiend. Both men raised their guns, both fired, and the unsuspecting father of murders, old Espinosa, fell over the red coals,

A LIFELESS CORPSE.

In exact accordance with the notions of Tobin, the other man's aim failed in its purpose, only wounding the young Mexican, upon whom Tobin soon drew his gun and despatched as quickly as he had done the elder. The intrepid Tobin then sent his companion to look after their horse, which they had left some rods away, without any witnesses save heaven and the blood-stained rocks of the ravine deliberately severed old Espinosa's head from his body, drew the long black hair up over his scalp, tied it in a knot, and, making his way to the spot where his friend was standing with horses, stuck his saddle-horn through the knot of the hair, and rode into Fort Garland, where he was received with enthusiasm, ex Gov. Gilpin, then the Governor of the Territory, being there with soldiers, all of whom gave Tobin a hearty reception.

The reward offered for Espinosa was large, but Tobin had great difficulty in securing it. One Legislature after another considered, or pretended to consider his claim in a weary "circumlocution office" kind of way, the years slipping by in the meantime, without Tobin's having received a cent. In the end, however, he received half the sum offered, which was a very comfortable amount.

As for Espinosa, he was a born desperado, who never plundered, and who did not commit murders as the means of gratifying revenge, but simply it is thought, because "he had a fancy for the kriglo." It is a singular fact that he never robbed the men he murdered, money and valuable having been frequently found on their dead bodies. His character is one of the most striking of any desperado's ever heard of in the West, and his memory still lives in the hearts of a score of early pioneers, who, for a period of two years, never lay down to sleep at night without dreading his approach.

Eleven-year-old Tommy Bickus of Indianapolis stole a horse and buggy, and drove away with them. The buggy didn't suit him, and he stole another that did. He kept this rig three days, taking daily rides for health and pleasure until he was arrested. He will be tried for grand larceny.

George B. Higley of Simsbury, Conn., recently lost his pocketbook and looked in vain for it. That night he dreamed that he had found the book and his spectacles, which as yet he had not missed, under a tree that he had set out the day before. In the morning he dug up the tree and there found the missing property.

William Anderson, a citizen of Cincinnati, objected to paying hack hire unless the hackman proved himself the better man. Finding argument useless, the hackman drove Mr. Anderson to a retired spot and there wiped the ground with him. Then, to his disgust, he found that Mr. Anderson hadn't a red cent and could not pay, though he had been well thrashed.

The other day a sailor belonging on a British vessel anchored off Vallejo, Cal., went ashore, and after a ramble of several hours he returned with a big rattlesnake, which he had put in a can. He was considerably surprised, when he pulled the serpent out of the can to show it to a native, to be told of the dangerous character of the pet he had caught.

There was recently in Exeter, N. H., a tournament of the New England Trap Shooters' Association, and fifteen boys were hired to work the traps. When all were ready the word "Pull" was given, but no glass balls flew in the air. Thrice the word was given without result, and then the leader of the boys arose and said: "We want a dollar and a half a day or no work." The strike was a success.

Jefferson Harman of Owingsville, Ky., was clearing a hillside of bushes not long ago. His axe became entangled in grapevines, and in his efforts to extricate it he stumbled and fell over a ledge of rocks fifteen feet high. It was not much of a fall, but Jefferson managed, before he reached bottom, to cut off his nose and most of his upper lip and to knock out nearly all of his teeth and break his jaw.

Henry Allis, who died in Coatesville, Pa., recently, was known to have saved $1,300, but it could not be found. After his burial the story got about that the money was sewed in the lining of the coat in which he was buried. Soon after the grave was opened, the coffin split open, and the body taken out. It was found in the graveyard, with the clothing scattered around, except the coat, which was missing.

Mrs. Stafford of St. Louis was spending the afternoon with a neighbor, when she saw a valuable setter dog of her husband's racing back and forth between the two houses and attempting to jump up to the window where she was sitting. She at length decided that something was wrong, went to her house, unlocked the door, and found that the house was on fire. The dog's warning was in time, and the building was saved.

A few days before William Ashworth of Oregon, Mo., died, he hid a quantity of gold coin. That was fifteen years ago, and though a careful search was made for the treasure, it could not be found. Last week Mrs. Ashworth emptied an old churn that had stood on a shelf in the smoke house for years. The churn was full of beans, and in the bottom was a tin can, and in the can was an old woollen sock, and in the sock was the long searched-for gold. It amounted to $712.

Jesse A. Johnson, who lives in southwestern Georgia, was driving home his cows the other evening, when he and the horse on which he rode suddenly went down out of sight. The earth had given way beneath them. In the descent Johnson and horse parted company, the former lodging on a ledge of rocks. The horse went down into a deep cave, and the man managed to get out. Next day the neighbors got the horse out by the aid of pulleys. The animal was not damaged, although he had fallen over fifty feet.

One of the striking journeymen plumbers of Buffalo says that the strike will show how the boss plumbers make so much money. He said: "I will tell you one way; if the war gets hot I may tell you more. They send men out who are no more than mere apprentices, and whose wages are not more than $1.50 per day; but it is charged in the bill at $5 per day, every time. Boys are thus made to do men's work and are paid men's wages, and exorbitant at that, by those who are unfortunate enough to have them sent to do their work."

It is related that when the first Maine railroad was started, about forty years ago, W. C. Pitman of Bangor was a conductor. One rainy morning he started from Waterville, and, on arriving at North Belgrade, a flag station, not seeing any flag, ran by the station. Just as the train had passed the red flag was run out for some passengers to get on. Mr. Pitman stopped his train and asked Stephen Richardson, the station agent, why he did not display the flag before. Mr. Richardson replied, "Be you a-goin' to run your train in rainy weather? I didn't think you would."

A resident of Minnesota, who has seen several severe tornadoes, says that there most peculiar feature is the singular sucking movement. Buildings are sucked up into the clouds entire, and come down soon in fragments. After the great Rochester tornado a farmer twelve miles from the town found an uninjured marble top table in his field. Another found a very large sheep that had come from no one knew where, and had been deposited in his yard unhurt. The Minnesota man further said that he had seen a board into which wheat straws had been driven until they stuck through on the other side. Also he saw a plank driven through a big tree, and a piece of pine moulding driven through a small butternut tree.

Judge Bybee of Portland, Ore., has an Irish setter, and between the Justice and the dog a very intimate friendship exists. The other day the Judge went to San Francisco without consulting the setter. As soon as the dog missed his master he went moping about, and refused to be comforted. The next day he grew moodier, and when three days passed by and still no master was visible he lay down in the closet where the hunting traps were kept, and refused all caresses, and for five days would not take a particle of food. Finally he wandered off to a livery stable, where his master's horse was kept, and would not be driven away. Once a day he went back to the house for food, and kept up this programme till the absent one returned.

Spirit Visitations.

The recent death, in an insane asylum, of Charles Foster, the originator of the doctrine of the spirit visitations, which caused at one time such a thrilling sensation throughout the whole of Europe, has aroused the attention of the marvel mongers once more. But the true psychologist finds a deeper interest in the study of the man himself than in the mere enumeration of the miracles he performed. There was the great mystery. The man was of the commonest type known to civilization—heavy, flabby, large featured, short necked, bow-legged, without ease or facility of movement—and yet he managed for years to lead the spiritists into the belief of every miracle he professed to prove, and to become an absolute idol in the eyes of his worshippers. The secret of his immense power lay in his concentration of thought, so it is imagined. "How do you know what answer to give to questions unexpressed?" said a learned English physician to Foster one day. "Because I do my own thinking with their thoughts," was the quick reply; which left the inquirer in greater perplexity than ever. Although the man was so dirty in his person and careless in his habits that he was nicknamed "Grubby Foster," yet there are many people who claim to have seen the most beautiful girls clasping him by the neck, kissing his flabby cheek with rapture, and weeping tears of tenderness upon his bosom—all the while beholding, in obedience to his will, the lost mother or sister long since buried in the grave. "Grubby Foster" was often invited to Knebworth, and laden with honors by Lord Lytton. He was the original Margrave in the "Strange Story," and while Lord Lytton's guest was introduced to the highest born and wealthiest in the land. Some of his deceptions have been discovered and exposed, while others have remained undetected to this day, although submitted to the minutest scrutiny by science. His American wit enabled him at one time to make a magnificent revenue. In Australia it is said he realized five hundred dollars a day by making the poor exiles behold in his hideous visage that of the dead relative or beautiful sweetheart they had left behind. Suddenly he disappeared from Europe and returned to America, where he was picked up in a state of forlorn wretchedness and conveyed a lunatic pauper to the asylum at Danvers. Here his madness assumed the most demeniacal form. His hatred to every human being was suggestive of possession by the powers of evil. Several times he tried to murder his attendant, and with the most treacherous cunning would seek to take that functionary by surprise. At last it would seem as if even the will to do evil had worn itself out, and he has just died a stupid idiot, unconscious of all outward sensation, and incapable of motion, save under compulsion. The extraordinary career of this same C. Foster gives us much to think of. At present science herself is at fault when contemplating the extraordinary denial of her power flung in her face, as it were, by the strange anomaly presented by nature.

THE ...BELLE CLUB.

"I has been walkin' 'round on top dis airth mighty nigh my allotted time," said Brother Gardner as the band ceased playing, "and yit some things are jist as much a mystery to me as when I was 20.

"We complain dat servant gals dean' know deir duties, an' we eddicate our darters to ignore housework as beneaf 'em. De hired gals of de next ginerashun won't be to blame if dey mix bread in de bath-tub an' mash 'taters wid a beer-bottle.

BOUNCED.

The Chairman of the Committee on Applications reported that the following applicants had been rejected for the cause named:

Over-Estimated Jackson, of Atlanta; concealed the fact that he had a wooden leg, and had been in jail several times for drunkenness.

Major-General Desire, of Peteraburg, Virginia, failed to mention in his application that he was a snake charmer and traveled with a side show. He was also very reticent about a certain transaction in kerosene oil, which retired him from public gaze for several moons.

John Henry Opengate, of Jackson, Mississippi claimed to be 37 years of age when he was over sixty, and he did not think it necessary to inform the club that he got his meat at another man's smoke house.

WANTED IT CHANGED.

Shindig Watkins desired to call the attention of the meeting to the fact that there was a shoal in Lake Huron which had been set down on the charts by the government surveyors as "Nigger-Head Shoal." He for one felt it to be a reflection on his race, and he hoped the club would forward its protest to Congress.

"Brudder Watkins, do you call yourself a nigger?" blandly inquired the President.

"No, sah—no, sah! In co'se I don't! I'se a cull'd man, sah!"

"Zactly, Brudder Watkins, an' so am I an' all de res' of de crowd. If dar' am any nigger who wants to complain about dat shoal let him go ahead; it am none of our funeral."

Brother Watkins sat down, but he didn't look exactly like a man who had gained a barrel and a half of valuable information for nothing.

CHARTER WITHDRAWN.

Giveadam Jones then presented a report of his recent trip to Dover, O., to which point he was dispatched to investigate complaints regarding the branch club granted a charter last year. He found the following shocking state of affairs existing:

1. No dignity on the part of the officers. The President permitted himself to be addressed as: "Old boy" and "you, there."

2. Members were allowed to remove their shoes and stockings to scratch the chilblains in open meeting.

3. The branch was in debt to every business house in the town, and its Treasurer had not been required to give bonds.

4. Lawless proceedings in the vicinity of the hall. Every hitching-post for half a mile around had been pulled up by the roots.

During his two days' stay in Dover he was robbed of his silver watch, hit in the neck with a brickbat and made the victim of two confidence games. He would recommend that the charter of the branch be withdrawn at once.

On motion of Shindig Watkins his report was accepted, and the recommendation adopted.

FINE REMITTED.

Some weeks since Judge Napoleon Cabiff removed one of his shoes during the meeting, contrary to rules, and placed his heel on a corner of the stove and went to sleep. When the heel got heated up it created an alarm, and members had an exciting time looking for what was supposed to be an incipient conflagration in the garret of the hall. The Judge was brought up under the provisions of the constitution and fined $700. Since that time he has made three different attempts to commit suicide, and at this meeting a petition signed by 178 of his friends was presented in his favor. His wife also sent down word that if his fine was not remitted and he restored to his former standing she would have to leave him, as she had become fearful of her life.

"I shall remit de fine," said the President in reply to the petition, "an' Judge Cabiff will agin resume his former standing, but I hope dis will be a warnin' to him. De man who deliberately ignores de rights of his feller-men mus' not look fur sympathy when his trubbles come."

The Judge said in explanation that he had not been quite right in his mind for several weeks previous to the episode which proved his downfall. He had taken to eating a cocoanut every night before going to bed, and he now felt clear-headed and active again, and could promise that neither his head nor his heels would get him into further trouble.

The meeting then went home.

CANADA'S EXHIBIT.

A Glimpse at the Colonial and Indian Exhibition in London.

As to the exhibition itself, it has every indication of excelling its immediate predecessors, both as regards general interest and utility; and, speaking particularly of Canada, it is happily assured that for extent and variety the present display will far exceed any previous effort. The space is considerably more than that allotted to the Dominion at the famed Philadelphia exhibition of 1876, and it follows, as a natural sequence to the remarkable agricultural and manufacturing progress of Canada during the past decade, that the exhibits show both in number and quality an immense advance upon any previous time. On entering the exhibition buildings one is at once face to face with striking reminders of Imperial development. On the various panels decorating the entrance hall are portrayed a series of views of the metropolis, and leading provincial and colonial towns. Among them will be found Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg and Victoria, an excellent panorama of Canadian civic growth and importance. Passing through the harmoniously arranged splendors from the Indian empire, crossing the court of United Australia, and down the central avenue, one finds the Canadian section, excellently placed in the central arcade, where, including annexes, transepts, corridors, 34,899 feet are provided. Extensions thence run into the west gallery, with 20,280 feet of space, and the west arcade with 2,080 feet, which, with additions in the east and west quadrant, the conservatory and gardens, Albert Hall and the new building adjoining, make in all just over 73,830 feet of gross space. First to claim attention are the decorations, the basis, as it were, of the whole display, and here one is at once struck by between the courts of Canada and the other colonies. The coloring is subdued, and in a sense unobtrusive. From the eastern corridor, through the transepts and central gallery to the western corridor, a length of 600 feet in a straight line, handsome show cases of dark Canadian woods line the sides at intervals. The walls are draped with maroon cloth, relieved by a deep old-gold valance in the bays round the court, with painted plaques bearing the word "Canada" and the letters "V. R.," while on either side of the upper lights hangs a pale lilac satin valance. The arches are picked out with gold tipped leaves, and at each spring of the arch, 12 feet high and 10 feet apart, appropriate flags on spears are festooned over shields ornamented with maple leaves bearing the names of the provinces of the Dominion. The effect thus distinctly differs from that produced by the magnificent tapestries and brilliancy of endless paints met with in many other courts, and herein lies an indication of the primary objects of the exhibits from the various colonies. Australian sene of the word? They have already, if anything, too large a population, and cannot be described as in any ardent haste to attract capital and enterprise. Hence, India and the class of countries it represents, can well afford to spend much of their energies upon decorative effect. Canada has other and more practical ends to serve. By her exhibits themselves, rather than the rare decorations, are desired to be the main objects of attraction, and while having due regard to unquestioned neatness in design and taste in execution, care has been taken to do nothing to detract in any way from the proper prominence due to the vast products of forest, mine, land and water. Following, therefore, the natural course, let us briefly glance at the remarkable gathering of Canada's resources, from the shores of the Atlantic to the waters of the Pacific, which is now filling the area at command.

A LEADING DISTINCTION

AGRICULTURE AND MANUFACTURE.

Commencing with the eastern approach to the central gallery, one finds first attention properly paid to agriculture, the backbone of Canadian progress. To this division the whole of the east transept is devoted. Vegetables, cereals, fruits, and woods from the isolated Anticosti, side by side with the remarkable products of the Canadian mainland, from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to Ontario, the Northwest and British Columbia, vie with one another in friendly zeal to show the agricultural and industrial advancement of their one country. And here some special features deserve attention. Many of the Indians of Canada may be found as agricultural exhibitors under their own names—a striking and encouraging instance of the progress of civilization among several of the tribes. Then, again, it will be observed by those who make search, that with other exhibitors of cereals, vegetables and fruit, are settlers who but a few years since left this, their native land, to try their fortune on Canadian soil. Noticeable among these are some of Lady Cathcart's crofters, now successfully settled at Wapella, North-west territories. Surely no more potent factor could be desired in the promotion of desirable emigration. The fruit exhibits of the different provinces will also prove a feature of no ordinary interest to the British, and indeed European visitors to the court. They consist of about 1,000 jars of fruit preserved in their natural condition in antiseptic fluids. Such large collections of grapes, pears, apples, peaches, late-keeping winter apples in fresh condition, as well as many other classes, must unquestionably prove of great practical value in demonstrating the suitability of the climates of Canada to the cultivation of fruit of nearly all varieties.

THESE PRODUCTS OF FARM

and orchard all centre round a highly attractive trophy of large but proportionate dimensions, built up with a variety of agricultural exhibits which, under able grouping, combine to give a striking general effect. Glancing down the central gallery—in which the manufactures and industries of Canada are exemplified—we find a handsome pavilion for the reception of Canadian organs, pianos, and general musical implements, faced on each side by well-filled cases of textile fabrics. Exactly in the centre of the gallery is erected a trophy of the commercial woods of British Columbia, especially from the famed Burrard Inlet, all highly polished, and displayed to considerable effect. Following after this centre-piece come miscellaneous manufactures, and among them the furniture exhibits will claim special attention. The Antwerp collection was in its way one of the features of the Canadian court. Still more so will this be the case in South Kensington, where the display is in every way far more representative. The canoes of Canada have acquired a world-wide reputation, and nowhere is their growth to favor more marked than on the Thames and among English oarsmen. It is hoped that opportunity will arise for the creation of a canoe trophy. There can be no doubt that such a display would possess much of interest to many visitors.

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

A weak mind is like a microscope, which magnifies small things but cannot receive great ones.

The darkest hour in the history of a young man is when he sits down to study how to get money without honestly earning it.

There is but little bad luck in this world, but there is a great deal of bad management.

One trouble makes us forget a thousand mercies.

Vice stings in pleasure, but virtue consoles in pain.

Man can not become perfect in a hundred years; but he can become corrupt in less than a day.

Nothing keeps a person from knowledge and wisdom like thinking he has both.

Fight your own battles—ask no favors. You will succeed a thousand times better than one who is always beseeching patronage.

Some people, like brooks, are always murmuring.

If you talk much beware of those who listen attentively.

He is happy whose circumstances suits his temper; but he is more excellent who can suit his temper to circumstances.

Obstinacy is the heroism of little minds.

A bad marriage is like an electric machine; it makes you dance, but you can't let go.

Sitting down on a hornet's nest is stimulating, but not nourishing.

A man may be so wrapped up in science that he forgets all things else; but he never fools with electricity and gunpowder more than once.

Kind words cost little; but they do more good than anything else.

The best way to look at a friend's faults is to shut your eyes.

Kindness, flavored with love, is the true principle for association.

Courage is always greatest when blended with meekness.

Mind your own business.

To Remove Chips from the Eye.

Those who are in engaged in mechanical operations run great risks of accident to the eye, and therefore a few hints in regard to this subject may be valuable to our readers. Minute particles of dust, sand, cinders, etc., are best removed by means of a camel hair brush or pencil, moistened, but not wet, and formed to a fine, smooth point. The brush will absorb the moisture of the eye and with it will take up the particle, provided the latter has not been driven into the eye ball. When the brush is not at hand, a thin strip of soft paper, rolled spirally so as to form a fine point, is the next best thing to use. The ragged chips and splinters which are separated during the processes of turning or chipping, often find their way into the eye, and are sometimes very difficult to remove. Magnets are of no use whatever if the chip is in any degree imbedded. In such a case, if the operator is gifted with a steady hand and firm nerves, the best instrument for removing the chip is a good sharp penknife, and is to be preferred. In simple cases let the patient stand up with his head firmly held against a door post, turn back the eyelids with the fingers, find the speck and by passing the knife gently but firmly over the ball as you would a razor in shaving, you may sweep it up. Where the chip is firmly imbedded in the eye, lay the patient on his back on a bench, turn the eyelids back and fix them by means of a key ring or a ring made specially out of a piece of stiff wire, then you will find yourself free to operate without danger of interference from the patient's winking. Iron splinters always have ragged edges, and can be caught on the fine, sharp edge of a knife and lifted out. Although the knife is the best instrument to use, it must be remembered that no cutting of the eye balls is to be permitted in any case except by an experienced oculist. Where the person who is operating is the least nervous or timid it will not do to use the knife. In this case, take some soft white silk waste and wind it round a splinter of wood so as to completely cover the end and form a little brush of looped threads. Tie it fast to the splinter. When such a brush is swept over that part of the eyeball in which the chip is imbedded, the latter will become entangled in the threads and be easily removed. A good magnifying glass is a good thing to have on such an occasion and is often handy for many other purposes about a shop.

The Horseback Cure.

There is a saying among the Russians that a man who is fond of his horse will not grow old early. The Arab and the Cossack are examples of the truth of the proverb. They generally live long, enjoy robust health, and have no use for liver pads and blue pills. That vigorous octogenarian, David Dudley Field, tells us that he attributes his remarkable vitality to the habit of horseback riding, and, if the truth were known, it would doubtless appear that our sturdiest old men are those who have been fond of the saddle. The taste for equestrian sports and exercise which has lately made such progress in Brooklyn is, therefore, a hopeful and healthful sign. It is not a mere freak of fashion, but a development in the direction of rational enjoyment and an assurance that the rising generation will be less of an indoor and more of an outdoor people. It means less headache hereafter, better appetites, stronger lungs, rosier cheeks brighter eyes, sounder sleep, happier spirits, and a total oblivion of that organ which, according to Sydney Smith, keeps men a good deal lower than the angels—the liver.

HOUSEHOLD.

Putting Up Things For Summer.

I have found the best way of putting away things for summer to be as follows: If you have not a regular camphor trunk—that is a chest made of camphor wood—take an ordinary trunk or chest that is well covered, so that it is perfectly tight, and put a layer of camphor gum in the bottom of it. Do up each article separately in a clean cloth, then do them up in newspapers, pasting the ends so they will be perfectly tight. What there is about printers' ink that moths dislike so it would be difficult to say, but there is something about it they don't approve of. I speak with a good deal of confidence on this matter, for I have treated furs of all kinds and woolen garments in this way for several years, and I have never had a moth get into a thing that was so protected.

Blankets I simply fold as large as possible to fit the trunk, avoiding more creases than is necessary, and lay them on the bottom of the trunk, without putting into papers, placing bits of camphor between each layer. If the trunk is not filled with the blankets, I put in the woolen underclothing, etc., then in another trunk the underclothes, cloaks, furs, hoods, and overcoats, these being done up in newspapers, a layer of camphor in the bottom of the trunk, and in the pockets of the coats and cloaks small pieces of the camphor gum.

For the removal of grease stains in such heavy fabrics as carpets, the most effectual methods, I think, will be to use absorbent materials, such as potter's clay, powdered soapstone, or buckwheat flour. Successive applications of one or the other of these will finally accomplish the desired result. The use of benzine, naphtha, turpentine, or other solvents is not to be recommended, as, owing to the thickness of the material, it will be next to impossible to prevent the solvent from spreading the grease over a large surface, leaving an ugly looking ring about the spot where it was applied.

Cold boiled rice may be utilized to make hot cakes for breakfast. To every two cups of rice add a quarter of a cup of flour, one egg, a tablespoonful of sugar and enough milk or water to make into a batter. Fry in hot drippings in small, round cakes and eat with maple syrup.

Before washing flannels, have the dust carefully beaten out of them in the open air. Then they are not scalded out in water muddy with their own dust. For that matter, a daily beating and brushing out of an upper story window should be the rule for all cloth skirts and all woolen dresses that are in daily wear.

An excellent dish for breakfast is made of six eggs and three tablespoonfuls of ham chopped very fine; beat in the eggs and, after melting a lump of butter in the frying-pan, drop the eggs into it and stir the ham in; the ham has of course, been cooked, either fried or boiled; season with pepper. This is a good way to use up pieces of meat that are left from dinner.

Choice Receipts.

Cheese Biscuits—Take as much cheese as you want for your biscuit, and with skim-milk mix it into a very stiff paste, after which roll it out to about the thickness of a penny, then cut into small pieces the size of a quarter-dollar, and rolling very thin, bake in a quick oven.

Steam Wheat Pudding—One cup of sugar, one cup sweet milk, two cups flour, two eggs, three tablespoonfuls of butter, two teaspoonfuls cream tartar, one teaspoonful of soda; one cup chopped raisins improves it. Steam one and a half hours. Serve with sauce.

Breakfast Rolls Without Soda—Two eggs, 1½ cupfuls sweet milk, a teaspoonful of salt, and flour enough to make a thick batter. These must be baked in an iron gem pan to be a success, and a quick oven is desirable.

Potato Chowder—Cut half a pound of salt pork into thin slices and fry slowly a light brown, and five large sliced onions. Let them color slightly. Put a layer of pared and sliced potatoes in a soup kettle, then a thin layer of pork and onions, season each layer with salt and pepper, and dredge with flour. When all the ingredients are used, cover with two quarts of water, let it come slowly to the boiling point, and cook forty minutes, or until the potatoes are done. About two quarts of potatoes will be needed. Any herbs, such as parsley or young celery tops, may be used also.

Cookies—One cup of butter, one of cream, three eggs, one-and-two-thirds cups of sugar, one teaspoonful of saleratus. Very rich and good.

Ginger Cakes for Breakfast—One cupful of New Orleans molasses, one of sugar, one of butter, two teaspoonfuls of soda. Put half a cup of hot water on the soda, pour this on the butter, mix soft, roll out, and cut like cookies. Bake in a quick oven. Use ginger to the taste.

One-Egg Cake—One egg, three-fourths cup of sweet milk, butter size of an egg, one cup of sugar, two and one-half of flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Flavor to the taste.

Photographing the Eyes of the Dead.

A Paris physician calls attention to an account of a recent attempt to observe in the retina of a murdered girl's eye the image of her unknown slayer. He said: "It's all nonsence to expect that this thing can be done. I have known of a dozen experiments, all of which failed from the very nature of the thing. All there is to it is this: The brilliant coat of the retina has a color due to what is known as visual purple, and this color is to some extent visible impressed by light. When in college we tried a careful experiment on a horse. We gave the animal atrophine and placed a negative of my own photograph over his eye. It was then kept in a dark room six hours. This was followed by exposing the retina to the picture in broad daylight for a few moments. The result consisted of three dark patches representing my chin, nose and forehead. It was an absolute failure as far as producing a recognizable likeness is concerned."

A young girl wants to know, "If it is true that kissing cures freckles." Wouldn't say, positively, but a simple receipt like this i worth trying. Call after business hours.

MARKDALE MAY 20, 1886

MARKDALE.

The history of our village has been an eventful one, and its moral reputation anything but desirable. Few places of its age and size have experienced so many serious and fatal tragedies, fires and other casualities. A marked change for the better has however set in, and while the enterprising and progressive characteristics of our leading business men, and constant and substantial growth and development of our village has won the confidence of capitalists and eulogies of travellers generally, we find that morally the place is fast gaining an enviable reputation. Our hotels—though there's more of them than is necessary—are kept orderly, and there is very little excessive drinking done by residents of our town.

The Sabbath day is, to all appearance, strictly observed; the Churches and Sabbath Schools are well attended, and enjoying prosperity and harmony amongst themselves as well as with each other. Our young people, which are the hope of our country, are above the average both in morals and intelligence, while our citizens generally are industrious, sociable and prosperous people. Under these favorable circumstances we cannot wonder that those seeking a desirable rural town in which to retire from farm life or other business occupations, should be favorably impressed with our village, and more than pleased after becoming residents and sharing the hospitalities of our people. Then we might go on to enumerate its other advantages, such as railway, being on the line of the greatest railway in the world, and only four hours run from Toronto, the greatest English city on the continent; its postal and telegraph facilities; its healthfulness, from natural causes, such as pure water, naturally drained soil; its educational advantages, &c., &c., all of which add to the importance of our village as it is, and its prospects in future.

NEW MAIL ROUTE.

While we in Markdale are well served with postal facilities, having two mails a day each way, we would not forget those who are not so fortunate, or in fact are very poorly accommodated. Walter's Falls for instance, a prosperous village twelve miles distant, with but two mails a week. This is an age of progress, and year by year the rural community are becoming more anxious to know the doings of the world, and to have the news prompt and direct from the press. We can see no valid reason why Walter's Falls may not have a tri-weekly mail from both Markdale and Meaford, thus serving a large number of ratepayers between those points. As it is, the mail is conveyed on Tuesday and Friday each week from Walter's Falls to Meaford and return, while it is forwarded from Markdale to Harkaway every Friday. Now Harkaway is only five miles from Walter's Falls, direct on the way, thus leaving a gap of only five miles to be supplied. It is 12 miles from Walter's Falls to Markdale and 14 to Meaford, so that the expense of forwarding the mail from Walter's Falls to Meaford and Markdale and return each alternate day, would not be increased very materially over what it is at the present time; for instance, a man at the Falls had the contract, leaving home for Meaford on Monday morning returning same day, and on Tuesday to Markdale and return same evening, and so on during the week, thus connecting with the mid-day mail both at Meaford and Markdale. Such a mail service would serve well, not only the people of Walter's Falls and vicinity, but also Harkaway, Strathnairn and all intervening points. What say Walter's Falls people to this scheme.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Afflictions, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. Noyes, 149, Power's Block, Rochester, N. Y.

THE CHEESE OUTLOOK.

We learn, through the medium of our exchanges and otherwise, that the establishment of cheese factories and manufacturing of cheese is steadily growing in this and surrounding counties.

The results of the past few years, being the infancy of the business in this district, has been, on the whole, satisfactory, not only in the increased profits from the dairy, but in decreasing the labor in connection with butter making.

We have no doubt the establishment of cheese factories through these northern counties will be the commencement of better times, as the soil, spring water and country generally is well adapted to this class of farming, and will have a decided tendency towards improving the fertility of the soil and at the same time exterminating Canada thistles and other noxious weeds.

We are glad to be able to note a decided advance this season in the cheese market, which opens firm at two cents higher than last year. This will almost cover cost of manufacturing, which is an important item. This, along with the early season, will be very encouraging to those in the business.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

To the Editor of the Standard.

SIR,—Whereas various and malicious falsehoods have and are being circulated by James Henry and W. G. Glassford, calculated to mislead the public with regard to the breeding, &c., of our imported horse, Lord Derby, we deem it our duty to let the public at large know the real facts of the matter,

1st. Those parties have said Lord Derby is not a sure horse—not over 20 per cent. of his mares last year were in foal:—to this we would say 80 per cent. of his mares were in foal.

2nd. Those glib gentlemen have the cheek to tell the public we offered $2,300 for their horse, General Gordon, but we wanted six years to pay for him. To this second falsehood we would say we thought so little of him we never made an offer neither directly nor indirectly. We don't deal in half-bred stallions.

3rd. These persons state Lord Derby never took a first-prize until he came to this locality. In answer to this, Lord Derby never was beat in his class but once, taking first prize wherever he was shown.

4th. Now, as to the pedigree of General Gordon he is not nor can he be registered either in Clydesdale stud book nor in the Shire class, although every effort was made to get him registered, all efforts failed. You ask the reason. Why, the reason is simply this, he is not a pure bred horse; his sire was a half-breed, and of course he can't be anything else but a mongrel.

Now, as to Lord Derby's pedigree, he was the first registered Clydesdale stallion imported into Canada. He is registered in the Scotch stud book, also in the American and Canadian stud books, and is now registered in new Canadian herd book. Should any person have doubts about this matter, we would refer you to Henry Wade, Esq., Secretary of Canadian Herd Book and Agricultural and Arts Association, Toronto, from whom all information can be had of the merits and demerits of the aforesaid stallions. Mr. J. R. Trimble, of Markdale, has the documents in his possession which will convince the most skeptical that Lord Derby is a pure bred Clydesdale horse.

Now, Mr. Editor, we hope we have not trespassed too much on your valuable space, we simply wish to set ourselves right with the public and set at rest for ever those evil disposed persons whose sole aim and delight is to raise falsehoods about our horse and scatter them broadcast over the land. We unhesitatingly say Lord Derby is the best sire horse of his class stands in Canada today. We stood pledged to the farmers of this country (who have stood nobly by us) to replace Garfield with another and a better horse, which we have done to the best of our ability.

We are the public's Obedient servants,
TRIMBLE & PICKELL.

To the Editor of the Standard.

In last week's issue of the STANDARD there is an article purporting to give the facts in reference to the sad accident which occurred a few weeks ago, through which Master Alfred Moffat received a very severe injury. The following are the facts: On Good Friday John Boyd, Thos. Noble and myself went over to the foundry; I was carrying the rifle, but was not aware that it was broken. We went to get the trigger filed; when this was done we started from the foundry, and had no intention of shooting at anything then, but when we had gone out of the foundry into a shed adjoining, Alf. came behind and asked me to try the rifle, saying "shoot at a post" which was only a few yards distant. I said it was too dangerous as there were horses in the field opposite. I had no cartridges on my person, but got one from Thos. Noble, put it in, and fired upwards, Alfred standing at my right side, and as I fired the cartridge burst, and a part of the shell flying upwards, struck him, and thus the unfortunate circumstance occurred.

The above is correct, as is attested by

JOHNSON WILSON,

[Two other names were attached to the above but the parties have requested us not to publish them.—ED. S.]

THE latest remedy for Coughs, Colds, Croup, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, etc., is McGregor's Lung Compound. There is no remedy in existence containing any one of the active ingredients composing McGregor's Lung Compound, so do not say you have taken everything until you have tried this for your cold or cough, and your opinion will be the same as all who have used it, viz., that it is the best. Sold in 50c. and $1.00 bottles by R. L. Stephen, Druggist, Markdale. 1

The poor cripple who has to use crutches on account of Rheumatism, stiff and swollen joints, contracted cords, and other aches, pains and lameness, may throw aside his crutches if he will try Hagyard's Yellow Oil faithfully.

The Great Source of Consumption and many wasting forms of disease, is scrofula lurking in the system. The true specific for this condition is found in Burdock Blood Bitters; that medicine purfies the blood and builds up the enfeebled frame.

From our own correspondent.

NARROW ESCAPE.—On Wednesday evening last some of the young females of our village were out promenading, and pausing for a while at the oft frequented spot, the Boyne Water bridge, some of them stood leaning over the railing leading to the bridge, when it gave way, and Miss Mamie, daughter of Rev. W. Ayers, was precipitated backward and fell to the river below, a distance of about ten feet, but fortunately escaped with a bad fright and some slight bruises. A warning for the city fathers to look after broken sidewalks and all dangerous places on public streets.

Mr. Hayes has leased Mr. W. H. Flesher's factory and has opened out in the pump manufactory here now. As we had no one in that line in our village there was a good opening for a man in that business. We welcome Mr. Hayes and wish him success in his enterprise here.

Our pushing and enterprising W. D. Varty, brick maker, is now running a big gang of men in his brick yard, so that he may have ample brick made to supply all the wants of his numerous customers in his line this summer.

The Flesherton cheese factory has again commenced operations for another season under the charge of Chas. Stewart, Esq., who has proved himself, in the past seasons, to be a first-class cheese maker.

Mr. W. H. Colquett, implement agent in this place, was taken suddenly ill on Thursday last with inflammation of the lungs, and altho' under the treatment of Drs. Kerr and Christoe, at the time of writing this (Tuesday) morning, all hopes of his recovery have been abandoned.

Mr. Aikinhead and son of Toronto have been spending a few days in this locality fishing. They are the guests of J. W. Armstrong, Esq.

Mr. Madill, of Corbetton, preached in the Presbyterian church here on Sabbath last.

The Torrens System.

(Canada Citizen.)

The annual meeting of Land Law Reform Association took place in Toronto a few days ago, and the time is therefore opportune for calling attention to what the society has accomplished. Its chief object is to get the Torrens system of transfer generally introduced in Canada so that in the case of all lands brought under its operation the registrar's certificate may be a certificate of absolute title. The assumption underlying the agitation is that it should be as easy to pass land from one person to another as it is to pass a horse or railway share and this assumption is not seriously disputed. There are, of course, obstacles to the general adoption of the system, but these will disappear through time and as the result of continued agitation. The majority of lawyers are opposed to it, for the present system of "searching" titles is a source of revenue to them. The present registrars are opposed to it, for their remuneration depends on the amount of "searching" of titles, and the "searching" would rapidly disappear under the Torrens system. Then the process of quieting the titles of land before it is brought under the system has been an expensive one. And lastly, no one thinks of making the change unless he is selling or buying.

It would be a great boon to the owners of lands if all lots hereafter patented in any of the Provinces were placed at once under the Torrens system. This would prevent the present confused system from spreading, and afford a large number of examples to illustrate the simplicity and economy of the method. Steps have been taken to secure so desirable an arrangement in the Northwest Territory and Manitoba, and similar steps will probably be taken at no distant day in Ontario. Meanwhile, in this province the Torrens system is confined to the Co. of York and the city of Toronto, and it is to be hoped that the number availing themselves of the security it affords will rapidly increase.

We are pleased to learn that A. Turner & Co our enterprising druggists have received the agency for the truly celebrated West's Pain King, a certain cure for all bowel difficulties, colic, cholera morbus and cholera. Only 25 cts.

HEALTH.

Baldness.

The cause of the falling out of the hair is not fully understood. In most cases it is doubtless due to some failure in the nutrition of the hair follicles. In the aged it connects with the feebleness that characterizes the functions of the skin generally. Heredity has much to do with it, as it has with all the bodily functions and organs. Individuals in some families become bald early in life from generation to generation. Coarse hair seems to have more vigor than fine.

It is well known that violent emotions sometimes suddenly blanch the hair, the cerebral nerve (the tropic centre, so called), which controls the nourishment of the hair, being affected by the shock. Fright has caused a rapid and almost immediate falling off of the hair.

Cases are on record of persons apparently in vigorous health whose heads, faces and bodies have become absolutely bare. There was no appreciable cause. The fault was doubtless at the nutritive centre in the brain, but what it was, no one can certainly say.

When the head is scurfy, there is often a connection between this condition and baldness. It is found that the scurf mixed with vaseline and applied to the hair of an animal causes a baldness on the part. In such cases the cause is probably a microscopic vegetable parasite. Two persons should never use the same hair-brush. There is little doubt that barbers have thus communicated baldness from one patron to another.

There is a form of baldness in which the hair suddenly begins to fall out in a small round spot, which gradually increases in area, the hair near the edge of the circle being brittle, and more or less broken. This has been proved to be due to vegetable organisms, which the microscope has detected within the hair-tubes.

It is probable that coverings which heat the head may result in loss of hair. But the effect is doubtless due to subsequent chilling of the surface, just as a severe cold or inflammatory rheumatism may result from sudden cooling of the heated body. The main remedy against premature baldness is the application of mild stimulating washes and tonics.

Notes.

A little girl in Watertown, N. Y., who was dying of scarlet fever, desired to send a kiss to a little playmate in another town. She kissed the letter, which was sent by mail to the little friend, who wholly unaware of the danger incurred, kissed the letter as a message from her dead friend. In a few days she herself died from scarlet fever contracted by means of this kiss.

Dr. Hand reports an epidemic of goitre among the inmates of the Minnesota State Reform School. Forty-four out of one hundred and forty were suffering at the time of the doctor's observation. It was thought that the origin of the trouble lay in the flour from which the bread was made. The usual treatment with a change in the flour was speedily followed by a cure of most of the cases.

CHEST APPLICATION.—In bronchitis and pneumonic affections the breathing is much relieved, and the congestion of the mucous membrane lessened, by bathing the chest with goose oil, slightly warmed, and then applying some old shirting or other material, saturated with the oil, to the whole thoracic surface. Often the addition of turpentine in the proportion of ¼ to the goose oil will greatly enhance the value of the application.

A small piece of resin dipped in water, which is placed in a vessel on a stove, will add a peculiar property to the atmosphere of the room, which will give great relief to persons with a cough. The heat of the water is sufficient to throw off the aroma of the resin, and gives the same relief that is afforded by a combustion of resin. It is preferable to combustion, because the evaporation is more durable. The same resin may be used for weeks.

DR. R. H. FOX states that in a severe case of rheumatism in which salicylate of sodium, potassium, quinine, colchicum and liniments had all failed to relieve the fever and pain, the relief was immediate after sponging with cold water and quickly drying the skin afterward. Although this is no new treatment, it is one which requires some courage to practice, and yet may be well adapted to certain severe cases in which the salicylic remedies are ineffectual.

Again we call your attention to the inestimable value of teaching children and other young people to fill their lungs as full as they can by determined and persistent efforts, and to exercise the chest and back muscles by manœuvres of the arms, such as thrusting them outward, upward, overhead, downward, etc. The method of treatment is a positive cure for consumption in its incipient stages. It is a cure for nervous diseases, dyspepsia, wakefulness, etc.

A CURE FOR FELONS.—As soon as discovered take some spirits of turpentine in a cup, dip the finger in it, and then hold the hand near a hot fire till dry; then dip in it again and repeat for fifteen minutes or until the pain ceases. The next day pare off the thick skin with a sharp knife and you will find something like a honeycomb filled with clear water, open the cells and the felon is gone. This remedy must be used at once when the felon is discovered or it will not avail.

In carrying children in the arms care should be taken not to carry them habitually on the same side, as this tends to make them one-sided, a condition that may be frequently observed in all the children of a mother who can nurse only from one breast. Not only the bodies but the heads and faces of a whole family can sometimes be drawn over to one side. The only remedy is to change the position frequently, a very difficult thing for such mothers to do, but something that good-will and attention can accomplish.

Mrs Mimosa—"Now, Johnnie, go and kiss your little sweetheart and make up." Johnnie—"No'm I won't." Mrs. Mimosa—"Go and tell her how much you love her and how sorry you are." Johnnie—"Guess not. Pa says he got into a breach of promise case by tellin' a girl that, and had to marry the old thing. I ain't runnin' no risks, I ain't."

A Money Making Sewing Machine Agent.

The New York Star reports an interview with a drummer, who furnished some information as to the way in which the members of the craft can sometimes make a good living very easily:

"When I first met Jack he was always flush. In fact he is now, but he is manager. Jack was at work then for a sewing machine house, and had charge of the city trade. He used to ask me often to dine with him, and I noticed he never paid for what he got. We seldom ate twice at the same place, and I began to think his credit was monumental. 'Next time we go to Craft's to dine let's take all the boys in the office with us,' said Jack, as we left a well-known restaurant one day. 'I don't like the place at all, and I'm anxious to eat up what he owes me.' 'Then he owes you money,' said I, to draw Jack out. 'Yes, they all owe me more than I'll ever get. I might quit work now and board around from place to place for two years and not eat the accounts up. You see, I once put an advertisement in a Sunday paper, which read something like this:

"'First-class board wanted for a first-class sewing-machine, direct from the factory. References required.'"

"'Well, I got over seventy-five answers. I was given the best of references—bankers, preachers and doctors. Most of the letters were from boarding-house keepers and restaurateurs. They were from all parts of the city. As manager of the city trade I could sell a city machine as a sample at the wholesale price. But I didn't do that. I picked out twenty good restaurants and boarding houses, and bought twenty machines on my own account on four months' time. The wholesale price of each machine was $19 and the retail price $55. Of course I paid $19 each, and sold them at the retail price. At each of the twenty places I told them if they wanted a brand new machine I would let them have one direct from the office for $20 cash, and would take the balance out in board. They jumped at it, especially as the machine was one of the best made, and I promised to take it back if not satisfactory. Near three restaurants I got a suit of rooms on the machine account. In less than two days I had delivered the twenty machines, had $400 cash in my pocket, with four months in which to pay for the goods. I had $700 to take out in board and lodging in various parts of the city, and, as I say, I got tired of eating up my profits on the scheme. The $700 was all profit and also $1 on each machine. Why, I worked the same plan on the tailors—they wanted sewing machines. I could sell a tailor a heavy manufacturing machine for $60 which cost me $30—and what an elegant suit of clothes I got for that $30.'"

Where the East Wind Comes From.

In the winter the sun is vertical to the south of the equator, and the southern hemisphere is being heated, which causes the air to expand, and it is gently flowing off in the upper stratum of the atmosphere into the northern hemisphere, and by this means the accumulation of air becomes very marked, especially over Russia and Northern Europe, where the cold is intense and the air consequently denser. The exceptional height to which the barometer commonly rises in winter and in early spring amply proves what might otherwise appear theoretical. As soon as the more southern portions of the northern hemisphere become heated, air ascends, and an indraft or general flow of air sets in from the north to supply its place. The east wind, which is indeed air from the northward deflected to the east by the earth's rotation, has blown for the most part overland before it reaches the British Islands, and, although cold, it is at every stage of its progress towards the south becoming relatively warmer by sheer contact with the earth, of a somewhat higher temperature, on which it is impinging, and the air is thus constantly becoming capable of holding more moisture by its well-known physical properties; but owing to the low temperature at which it started, and the consequently small amount of moisture which it could possibly hold in solution in the form of vapour, it is ever ready to lick up more moisture in whatever shape or form available. It is this dryness, coupled with a certain degree of cold, which renders the east wind so intensely disagreeable and unhealthy in its effects, since it saps the moisture from our bodies, and tends to warm itself by conduction, and robs the human frame of a large amount of animal heat, and thus levies a severe tax on the constitutions of all exposed to it. It is seldom in this country that an east wind is accompanied by damp weather, although occasionally it does so happen; but, whether dry or moist, it is unmistakably disagreeable and notoriously unhealthy. The greater the dryness of the air the greater the energy with which the human body exhales from every pore of the skin, and more especially from the lungs and the more delicate parts of the mucous membrane.—London Standard.

SAVED BY A DREAM.

The Mysterious Stranger and the Fallen Tree.

While so-called superstition is ridiculed by all intelligent people at the present day, it is nevertheless a fact that nine people out of ten have more or less superstition in their natures, and give rein to it. Dreams are supposed by the masses to have just as much significance as a hundred years ago, and Friday is considered the unlucky day of the week the same as when sailors refused to leave port on that day. There is, however, say what you will, something in dreams, visions, warnings, and the like which now and then startles candid and intelligent minds.

A few years ago a man named Bronson, who was an agent for a big seed house, was travelling through Ontario making collections for his house. He had to visit many towns off the railroads, and in such cases he secured a horse and buggy or rode horseback. One night after he had finished his business in a certain town he made ready for a horseback trip of fifteen or twenty miles the next day. Upon retiring to his room for the night he sat down to smoke a cigar. He was neither overtired nor sleepy, but after smoking a few minutes he had what he termed a vision. He was riding over the country on horseback when at a junction of the roads he was joined by a stranger. He saw this man as plainly as one can see another in broad daylight, noting the color of hair and eyes, and taking particular notice of the fact that the horse, which was gray in color, had a "y" branded on its left shoulder.

The two rode along together for a mile or more, and then came to a spot where a tree had blown down and fallen across the narrow highway. They turned into the woods to pass the spot, he in advance, when he saw the stranger pull a pistol and fire at his back. He felt the bullet tear into him, reeled, and fell from his horse, and was conscious when the assassin robbed him and drew his body further into the woods. He seemed to see all this, and yet at the same time knew he was dead. His corpse was rolled into a hollow and covered with brush, and then the murderer went away and left him alone. In making an effort to throw off the brush the dead man came to life; that is, the agent threw off the spell and awoke himself. His cigar had gone out, and as near as he could calculate he had been unconscious, as you might call it, for about fifteen minutes. He was deeply agitated, and it was some time before he could convince himself that he had not suffered any injury. By and by he went to bed and slept soundly, and next morning the remembrance of what had happened in his vision had almost faded from his mind.

Luckily for Bronson, he made some inquiries at the livery stable as he went for his horse, and he was told that it was a lonely road, and that it would be prudent to go armed. But for this he would have left his revolver in his trunk at the hotel. He set out on his journey in good spirits, and found the road so romantic, and met horsemen going to town so often that he reached the junction of the roads without having given a portion of the night to the vision. Then every circumstance was suddenly recalled in the most vivid manner. He was joined there by a stranger on a grey horse, and man and beast tallied exactly with those in the vision. The man did not, however have the look or bearing of an evil-minded person. On the contrary, he seemed to be in a jolly mood, and he saluted Bronson as frankly as an honest stranger would have done. He had no weapons in sight, and he soon explained that he was going to the village to which Bronson was bound on business connected with the law.

The agent could not help but feel astonished and startled at the curious coincidence, but the stranger was so talkative and friendly that there was no possible excuse to suspect him. Indeed, as if to prove to his companion that he meditated no evil, he kept a little in advance for the next half hour. Bronson's distrust had entirely vanished when a turn in the road brought an obstruction to view. There was a fallen tree across the highway! This proof that every point and circumstance in the vision was being unrolled before his eyes gave the agent a great shock. He was behind the stranger, and he pulled his revolver and dropped his hand beside the horse to conceal it.

"Well, well!" said the man as he pulled up his horse. "The tree must have toppled over this morning. We'll have to pass around it to the right."

Bronson was on the right. The woods were clear of underbrush, and naturally enough he should have been the first to leave the road. But he waited.

"Go ahead, friend," said the stranger, and as if the words had been addressed to the horse, the animal which the agent bestrode started up.

Bronson was scarcely out of the road before he turned in his saddle. The stranger had a pistol in his right hand! What followed could not be clearly related. Bronson slid from the saddle as a bullet whizzed past him, and a second later returned the fire. Three or four shots were rapidly exchanged, and then the would-be murderer, uttering a yell to show that he had been hit, wheeled his horse to gallop off. He had not gone ten rods when the beast fell under him, and he kicked his feet from the stirrups and sprang into the woods and was out of sight in a moment. The horse had received a bullet in the throat and was dead in a few minutes.

As a matter of course Bronson put the case in the hands of the proper officials, but the horse could neither be identified nor the man overhauled. It was agreed that he was an entire stranger in that locality, and that, while he did not know Bronson nor the business he was engaged in, he was ready to commit a cold blooded murder, and take his chances of finding a fat wallet to repay him.

A Melancholy Wedding.

At the Novgorod prison chapel (says the Russian Peterburgskia Gazette) a couple was recently married. A young fellow of the name of Zamizki, who had been sentenced to a term of imprisonment for fourteen years and six months with hard labour, married a young girl who was the daughter of a soldier, Yefremoff, and had only been released from the Novgorod prison at the beginning of the present year. Zamizki had told his brother of his intention to marry, but the latter thought the prisoner insane, deeming it impossible that any woman could be persuaded to marry a convict. He was, however, convinced of the truth by the prison administration consenting to the marriage. On the wedding-day the warder appeared in the prisoner's cell, his chains were removed he was dressed in a black suit, and taken to chapel, where the bride appeared with the bridegroom's brother, dressed in a white bridal dress and veil. At two o'clock the ceremony was begun, several prisoners assisting. One hour the newly-married pair were allowed to spend together in their cell, the warder drinking their health and then retiring to leave them with a steaming tenurn and a sentinel at the door. During the whole of the time the husband tried to persuade his wife to go with him to the convict colony to which he will shortly be despatched. At the expiration of the hour the warder reappeared, the convict doffed his wedding garments for his prison gear, and the wife went silently away, accompanied by her husband's brother.

Romantic Story.

A romantic story comes from the province of Limburg, on the Dutch frontier. The owner of a large manufactory who had married young and was left a widower had an only daughter to whom all the most desirable young men in the neighbourhood were paying attention. Her father noticed that she treated them all with indifference, and showed a marked preference for a young clerk of his, an orphan, with no means but his salary. As he had always given the greatest satisfaction in the performance of his duties, and was exceedingly well conducted, the father, persuaded that he would never venture to raise his eyes to his daughter, who evidently was sincerely attached to him, made up his mind to broach the matter to him. What was his surprise when the young clerk, after much hesitation, told him he would be only too happy to regard the young lady as a sister; but he could not marry her, because he was not a man, but a young woman in disguise—a disguise she had adopted when left an orphan, in order to get a more lucrative situation! The conclusion of the story is that instead of marrying the daughter, she is now the wife of the father.

A Prince Who is a Popular Oculist.

Hundreds of patients suffering from eye disease continue to come to Meran to seek help from the famous eye physician, Prince Carl Theodor of Bavaria. Every day he receives for three or four hours, when anybody may call who suffers from eye disease. He examines and prescribes free of charge for all, and gives the poor besides medicines, eyeglasses, bandages, &c.

For patients who require a longer cure the Prince has erected an establishment for clinical treatment, where those who come are cared for and treated free of charge. At all great operations, which he performs twice a week, he is assisted by his spouse, born Princess of Portugal. At a recent operation, for example, she held the patient's head for three hours, although the blood from the operation saturated her clothing.

An Improper Story.

BY BURNETTE.

It ain't jest the story, parson, to tell in a crowd like this,
Weth the virtuous matron a frownin', an' the in' the giggilin' miss,
An' the good old deacon a noddin' in time with his patient snores,
An' the shocked sleet of the Capitol, flashin' away through the doors.

But then, it's a story that happened, an' every word of it's true,
An' sometimes we can't help talkin' of things thet we sometimes do.
An' though good society coldly shuns its doors onto "Teamster Jim,"
I'm thinkin' ther's lots worse people ther's known than him.

I mind the day he was married, an' I danced at the weddin', too;
An' I kissed the bride, sweet Maggie—daughter of Ben McGrew.
I mind how they sat up housekeepin', so young, poor, happy fools,
When Jim's only stock was a heavy trade in four Kaintucky mules.

Well, they lived alone contented, with their little joys and cares,
An' every year a baby come, an' twice they came in pairs;
Till the house was full of children, with their shoutin' and playin' and squalls,
An' their sin'in' an' laughin' and cryin' made
Bedlam within its walls.

An' Jim, he seemed to like it, an' he spent his evenings at home.
He said it was full of music an' light, an' peace from pit to dome.
He joined the church, an' he used to pray that his heart might be kept from sin—
The stumblin'est prayin'—but heads and hearts used to bow when he'd begin.

So, they lived along in that way, the married day to day,
With plenty of time for drivin' work, an' a little time for play.
An' growin' around 'em the sweetest girls and the liveliest, manliest boys,
Till the old gray heads of the two old folks was crowned with the homliest joys.

Eh? Come to my story? Well, that's all. They livin' jest like I said.
Only two of the girls is married, an' one of the boys is dead.
An' they're honest, an' decent an' happy, an'
the very best Christians, I know,
Though I reckon in brilliant company they'd voted a little slow.

Oh, you're pressed for time—excuse you! I'm
I'm sorry I kept you so long;
Good-bye. Now me looked kind o' bored, but an' I reckon that I was wrong
To tell such a commonplace story of two commonplace lives,
But we can't all git drunk an' gamble an'
an' run off with other men's wives.

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

Sunlight has been put to an odd use in Russia. Falling on a small shaft the rays cause an upward draught of air which sets a fan in motion, and that, in turn, starts machinery that winds a clock.

The electric-lighting dynamo at Lincoln's Inn Dining Hall and Library, London, is driven at a rate of not less than 12,000 revolutions a minute by a Parson's high-speed engine. It is claimed that this is the first motor that has ever been made to work at the actual velocity of the steam as it escapes from the boiler.

The Popular Science News asserts that the average length of life is constantly increasing, and the time may yet come when persons one hundred years old will excite no more curiosity than one of eighty years at the present time.

The invention of the type-writer dates as far back as 1714, when one Henry Mill obtained in England a patent for a device that "writes in printed characters, one after time and one after another." But it was not until 1867 that it was improved so as to work satisfactorily.

Attention has lately been called to the races of men that must soon become extinct. At the present rate of decrease, the Maori of New Zealand—now reduced, to less than 45,000 from 100,000 in Captain Cook's time—must have disappeared by the year 2000. The Laplanders are estimated not to exceed 30,000 in number, and are gradually becoming fewer.

Prof. Josef Korosi, the statistician, finds that the rich class average fifty-two years of life, the middle class average forty-two years one and one-tenth months of life, and the poor class average forty-one years seven months of life. From this it is evident that the possession of wealth and the means of exemption from privation lengthens the average life nearly ten years.

Dr. Bond states that for adults the most important elements of milk are its albuminoids and salts, which contain the nitrogen and phosphates. These elements are present in just as large a proportion in skim milk and butter milk as they are in whole milk. Whole milk is, however, the best food for the young, who often need the abundance of fatty matter in an easily assimilable form.

A curious needle is in possession of Queen Victoria. It was made at the celebrated needle manufactory at Redditch, and represents the column of Trajan in miniature. This well known Roman column is sculptured with numerous scenes in sculpture, which immortalize Trajan's heroic actions in war. On this diminutive needle scenes in the life of Queen Victoria are represented in relief, but so finely cut and so small that it requires a magnifying glass to see them.

A nice way to serve eggs with broiled ham is to butter some patty tins, sprinkle them scientiously with fine crumbs of bread, break an egg into a saucer, and then, without disturbing the yolk, pour it into the tin. Put the tins into a hot dripping-pan and let them stand in the oven until the white is cooked. Then after putting the thin pieces of broiled ham upon a hot platter, take the eggs from the oven and turn out on the ham. It is not necessary to close the oven door while the eggs are in it, and indeed it is better not to do so.

An efficient method of disinfecting sink and other waste pipes is to fill a two-pint bottle with a solution of copperas, two ounces of copperas to a quart of water—fitting a perforated cork to the bottle, with a small glass tube thrust through the hole in the cork, invert the bottle over the opening of the waste pipes, letting the contents run into it. Other germicides may be used, but copperas is best for general purposes, since it is cheap and not poisonous. If this plan were universally adopted in cities the danger of potential disease would be greatly lessened, if not entirely sterilized and rendered harmless in the incubative state.

Say an Encouraging Word.

BY FRANCIS S. SMITH,

Say an encouraging word to the weary,
The to whom life seems all darksome and dreary,
One kindly sentence their sad hearts may lighten,
One smile of love their existence may brighten.

Say an encouraging word to the erring,
The hunted, hunted down, crushed and despairing,
Even when vice his worst form is revealing,
One word in season may wake better feeling.

Say an encouraging word to the toiler;
Poverty threatens him—help him to foil her—
When his heart sinks at the dark prospects near him,
One loving sentence may strengthen and cheer him.

Say an encouraging word to the weeper
Mourning a lost one—what grief can be deeper?
When the full heart is with agony aching,
One loving sentence may keep it from breaking.

Say an encouraging word to all classes,
Such heart-lightner that nothing surpasses;
Oh, 'tis so easy and pleasant to use it,
And when 'tis so easy enough to refuse it?

A Young Sailor's Story.

Three years ago I shipped on board the [illegible], Captain Phillips. Our voyage was to Hilo, Sandwich Islands, and back to Puget Sound, whence we sailed. The captain, officers and crew were, when I joined, all Americans and West Indiamen; but as another hand was wanted besides myself, I persuaded Jack Chester, an Englishman with whom I had become friendly to fill the vacancy. Jack was a fine looking fellow, a jovial companion, and had lots of information, which he know how to use; although he dressed and looked like a sailor, he had not been long on board ship before it became plain that he had not been brought up a salt.

Our captain was a Tartar and no mistake; but as he had the eye of a hawk, no fault committed by man or boy escaped him. This was especially unfortunate for my Englishmate. He had shipped on able-seaman's wages; but his deficiencies were so many and glaring, that our captain, who seemed to watch his movements more carefully than those of the rest of the crew, often inflicted upon him punishments painful to witness. I had a strong attachment for Chester, and stood his friend whenever I could, by taking some of his duties along with my own; but I was not always at hand to help him, so he fell oftener than otherwise beneath the captain's displeasure.

One night, when I was at the wheel, the wind blew into a gale. The captain came on deck and set all hands to reef the topsails. The men were manning the halyards to hoist away, when poor Chester, instead of letting go the reef tackle, let go the weather fore topsail brace, and away went the yard fore and aft. By luffing up smartly, however, we managed to get it checked without carrying anything away. But Captain Phillips, frothing at the mouth, swore he would tan the foolish lubber's hide who had done so clumsy a thing. Saying which, he rushed at Chester with a piece of ratline, with he brought down upon his neck and shoulders, giving them a fearful cut. He was in the act of raising it again, all hands looking on in silence, when a voice from aloft roared out, "Hold your hand!"

The voice was wonderfully loud and clear, seemingly coming from the maintop. The captain fell back, and looking up cried, in great rage: "Aloft there!"

"Hallo!" was the answer back.

"Come down upon the deck," was the captain's imperious order.

"Come up here and see how you will like it," was the contemptuous response.

"Come down, I say, upon the deck," roared the captain.

"Come up and fetch me," returned the voice from aloft.

"Who is up there, Mr. Rassom?" cried the captain appealing to the first officer.

"No one, sir," was the reply, "as far as I can see. All seem present on deck."

The captain's rage was now terrible to witness. "All seem present, Mr. Rassom? What do you mean by that, sir? I ask you again, who is up there?"

"No one known to me, sir," returned the mate, "All are present. All are on deck, all right."

Such was the case. But the second mate, without awaiting orders, sprang up the rigging and looked over the top-rim, then made the circuit of it, looking all round the masthead, and then reported himself alone.

"Then the ship must be haunted!" cried the chief mate.

The captain hereupon dropped the rope which he had held in his hand and went below. It was evident that he was strangely affected by what had occurred. And so the fellow-countryman escaped further punishment that night.

Set in a few days our skipper had forgotten his fears, and looking out for another object upon whom to vent his spleen, I had the ill-fortune to feel his wrath. He ordered me to make a knot in the end of an old frayed rope to be used for a lashing. In a little while I returned, saying that I had made the best job I could of a rope which was quite fagged out.

"Well," said he, "if that's your best, you are as much of a lubber as your friend Chester. But I'll dock you both to ordinary seaman's wages." I tried to show him that the rope was too much worn to make a neat piece of work of it. "Indeed," I said, "it is badly fagged."

"Fagged is it?" cried he scornfully; "then I'll finish it over your lubberly back."

"No you won't," roared out a voice from behind the long boat. The captain rushed in the direction of the sound, but he failed to discover the speaker.

"Who was that? he cried in a storm of wrath, adding: "Let me know who it is, and I'll thrash him within an inch of his life."

"Will you? hah! hah! hah!" was the mocking reply, dropping seemingly from the maintop.

It was broad daylight when this took place, so everyone could see that there was no one up there. I was as much startled and mystified by the occurrence as was the captain; but neither he nor I, nor any of the crew to whom he appealed, could throw any light thereon. But, whoever or whatever uttered the words, my purpose was served, as was Chester's on a previous occasion. The fact that Captain went below filled more with fear than rage, throwing behind him, as he stepped upon the cabin ladder, the rope's end which had so vexed him.

Sailors in general are superstitious beings. Whatever cannot be easily made out or accounted for on natural principles is laid to the account of the supernatural. Our captain was no better in this respect than his crew, for he was as illiterate as they except in the matter of navigation and as rough and untutored. He evidently believed that his ship was haunted, and that a spirit from the vasty deep had a mind to torment him by its interferences. On retiring to rest, at the end of his evening's watch, his slumbers were aroused by a loud and fearful cry which seemed to enter the cabin by the side-light which was left open for ventilation. The cry was heard by the second officer, who was on the quarter-deck, and by Chester who was at the wheel; neither of whom could throw light upon the incident to the captain, who had rushed on to the deck in a state of terror, and demanded in vain for the production of the offender.

From that day it was clear to us all that Captain Phillips was tormented by apprehensions of coming disaster. An idea was fixed in his mind that his ship was visited by a spirit from the invisible world, who preferred to make itself heard rather than seen. And this idea was strengthened by the fact that when he was on deck, and became angry at the conduct of any of the men; especially when his anger was made manifest in oaths and blows; the unseen but ever-vigilant visitor from afar would—perched apparently on the top of the main-mast—utter the insolent laugh or the dolorous warning. On these occasions the poor man would rush off to his cabin, with blanched cheek and tottering limb, and there abide until the gale in his moral sensibilities should subside. That it was angry with no one else but the captain was clear, from the fact that it never took any notice of the conduct of any other person. The mate or the boatswain might act as they liked, or the men jibe and chaff each other; no matter—the voice was not heard—neither laugh nor moan fell upon our ears. But most of those who lived in the forecastle were far from being happy, many of them shared the fears of the skipper; and I saw they would much rather have braved his wrath than be tormented as they were by the "voices of the night" or the "day." Myself and Chester were exceptions. What his opinions were he would not say: he met all my questions by adroit evasions. As for myself, I had no explanation to give, neither had I any fear, for I ate, slept and worked as well as before.

Thus matters went on until we were within two days' sail of the Islands. All the while our poor captain had been kept from tyranny by his fears of the voice; but now, exasperated by some fault in seamanship on the part of Chester, and being the worse for liquor, he hurled a belaying pin at him, which struck him on the head. Clapping both hands thereon, with a yell he rushed into the forecastle. It was evident the skipper expected to hear the voice, for he looked nervously aloft; but when all was silent in that direction, his courage returned, and he desired the second officer to call Chester back to the deck. Getting no answer to his call, the mate went below, when he found the poor fellow delirious. Returning to the deck, he reported him to be in a dangerous condition.

This filled the captain with fear. He ordered that every attention should be paid him, which was done. That night it became necessary to have all hands on deck to reef, and while we were on the yards an awful cry, like that of a maniac, arose from the bows of the vessel, and next moment several of us saw a human form on the rail near the fore-swifter, and then a loud splash was heard in the water under our lee.

The captain and chief officers who were on deck rushed to the side. A hat was seen for a moment bobbing on the crest of a wave; the maniacal scream was repeated, when Captain Phillips, himself uttering a cry, fell senseless on the deck. The mate then hailed us who were on the topsail yard—"Come down from aloft! clear away the small boat!" We thought he was as near beside himself as was the captain: and so he was for the moment, for by the time we had gained the deck he was ready to countermand the order. Everything was awful beyond expression, the wind and the water were raging wild; it was impossible for a small boat to live in so rough a sea; so, making a virtue of necessity, the search for the poor maddened fellow was abandoned, amid vows of vengeance against the captain and tears for our lost messmate.

Forty-eight hours after this we entered the port of Hilo. A vast change had come over the crew. The captain, knowing their peculiarities, had supplied them with money and copious libations of whiskey; so, instead of reporting him to the Consul, as they had declared they would, they were ready to shout his praises all day long. In this, however, I did not agree; but unable to bring the tyrant to justice single-handed, I resolved to quit the Niger.

I did so. After hiding in the woods several days, I was caught and brought back to the ship. As my adventures as a fugitive are not essential to the unfolding of my story, I pass them by, and take up the thread of my narrative.

We set sail on our return voyage. Captain Phillips was an altered man. He abstained from spirits, he controlled his temper, and this, with the addition of a fine steady breeze, made our lives on board happy. But, alas! we were doomed to a sad ending-up of the voyage. Keeping too near the land, and a squall laying hold on the ship, we were driven on a lee-shore. It was just after midnight when we struck, and the darkness was terrible. The shock aroused me from my slumbers, and leaping out of my hammock, I ran on deck. I cried out to my shipmates, but got no answer. It was not possible to reach the after part of the vessel where the life-belts were kept, so, acting on the impulse of the moment, I leapt into the sea. Catching hold of a friendly rock, I was saved. Daylight came after a weary waiting. The first thing I saw was the dead body of poor Captain Phillips, and not far from it that of our Chinese cook. The rest were saved.

We made our way to Portland, where we were paid off. Thence I proceeded to San Francisco. I had often asked myself whence came those strange voices and fearful words, which had so alarmed our captain and put most of the crew in terror, and had so opportunely on one occasion saved me from the vengeance of the captain. But it was beyond my power to answer the enquiry, neither could the mate nor any of the survivors throw light thereupon. Had we known what ventriloquism was, we might have had therein a solution of the mystery; but I had never heard an adept in that art, neither had any of my shipmates, otherwise I judged such fact would have been mentioned and the voices accounted for on that ground. Poor Chester, when with us our most intelligent shipmate, seemed to be as much in the dark as the rest of us, but he was not in the least put out of the way by the occurrences, though he foreshowed in others the supernatural idea.

Strolling along the streets of San Francisco one night, about a year after the wreck, ready for anything in the way of amusement that might turn up, my eye caught a large poster which announced the wonderful doings of Professor Meredith—"the unrivalled and world-renowned ventriloquist."

"This," thought I, "shall be the source of my evening's enjoyment." Turning my face in the direction of the "Hall of Science and Emporium of Amusement," I was soon seated in a snug corner of the body of the building, and was not long in being carried away by the wonderful sayings and doings of the Professor. At last he told us that he would hold an imaginary conversation with a person up the chimney. He did so. When in the midst of a dialogue, the person up the flue gave a derisive "hah, hah, hah!" I was startled. I sprang from my seat. "Surely," said I, half aloud, "that is the voice, and tone, and words which more than once came from the maintop of the Niger." And while I was staring at the Professor, with eyes ready to leap out of their sockets, he came to the front of the stage to perform his part. Then, in spite of his flowing beard and other decorations, I saw in Professor Meredith the identical Jack Chester, who, over twelve months before, was believed to have leaped in a fit of madness into the sea, and was drowned.

"Chester!" I cried out, in my excitement.

"Sit down!" cried one; "put him out," said some others. In the meanwhile I had come to myself, and resumed my seat, but not before I had got from the Professor a sign of recognition.

When the performance was over, my old shipmate, for it was he, beckoned me to him, and taking me to his private room, he grasped my hand in all the fervency of ardent friendship. "Sit down, Henry, my boy," he said, "and you shall have a solution of the mystery which hangs over me and the past."

"How came you to be saved from a watery grave on that awful night when you plunged into the raging sea?" I impatiently asked.

"I did not jump overboard," replied Chester, laughing; "neither was I any less sane than I am at this moment. The entire affair was a trick of my own invention to frighten the captain, and then get away from his clutches. My madness was a sham, and the man overboard was simply a bundle of old togs, topped by my old hat, which I had just put together. The moment I pitched them over the rail I slipped down into the fore-peak where I lay hid until the night after the ship entered the port, when I stole out and went on shore. I had taken care to lay up plenty of junk, and I managed to avoid detection until the Niger sailed. The cries which you heard from the main-top, from behind the long-boat, and in the cabin I need not now explain."

"No," said I, "all is made clear by the doings of this night."

"Exactly so," said he. And then he continued—"I had performed as a ventriloquist in most large cities and towns in Europe before you knew me; but becoming somewhat restless in my habits, and having squandered all my earnings, in a fit of recklessness I took to the sea, and in the capacity of a sailor found my way to Puget Sound. But I had not in me the stuff of which sailors are made, so after my adventures on board the Niger I went back to my old profession, in which I have done well. My wild oats are all sown, I hope, and having learnt wisdom by bitter experience, I shall stick to that line of life for which I have capacity; a better thing than splicing old ropes, or taking in topsail reefs on a blowing night.

"I should think so," I said. "But you nearly killed the captain with fright, whilst you caused us many a heartache at your supposed loss."

"For the latter I am very sorry," returned Chester. "But I cannot say that I pitied the captain. His cruelty to me was terrible, and he would possibly have ended by killing me, but for my fortunate gift of ventriloquism. All's well that ends well."

"True," I returned. "And I rejoice that you are alive to say so. You kept your secret famously, for neither Captain Phillips nor any of his crew ever suspected that incapable Jack Chester was the ghost that haunted the Niger."

A communication in last week's Advance makes strong insinuations that our reference to the matter in the STANDARD of the previous week was misleading, and intended to convey the idea that the injury was done maliciously. A lawyer may make black appear white and vice versa, but no unbiassed mind could put such a construction an said item. There was no intended harm on the part of any, neither was any one to blame in particular; it was purely accidental.

The last new venture in illustrated journalism is THE MIRROR, an eight page paper published in Toronto, whose aim is "to hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature," in accordance with Hamlet's advice to the players. We do not profess to know how such a publication, issued at 5 cents per copy or $2.00 annual subscription, can be produced with such a degree of excellence and yet be found remunerative; but that is, after all, "none of our business." The initial number which is printed on toned paper and may be characterized as a perfect mode of typographical perfection, contains original illustrations of the presentation of the North-West medals to the Toronto volunteers, some interesting views from the vicinity of Ottawa and Peterborough, portraits of the 12 members of Toronto Bass-Ball Club, and also some capital original comic sketches. Great attractions are promised for the second number including illustrations from original sketches of the anti-Scott Act dynamite outrages at Orangeville.

Faithful prayer always implies corelative exertion; and no man can ask honestly and hopefully to be delivered from temptation unless he is himself honestly and firmly determined to do the best he can to keep out of it.

Where you are, whatever your station, there, and in that station, serve God. Establish in your own heart the principles of a Christian life and in your home the atmosphere of a christian household. Be regular in your habits of prayer, search the Scriptures daily, resist temptations courageously and do good gladly.

The practical life of the Christian comprehends three distinct elements. We have to do the will of God in our business; this is working. We have to oppose our sin and resist temptation; this is fighting. We have to endure with cheerfulness and submission whatever cross the Lord Jesus lays upon us; this is suffering.

A thoughtless boy with a shining pail went singing gaily down the dale, to where a sad-eyed cow with a brindle tail on clover sweet did herself regale. A bumble bee did gaily sail over the soft and shadowed vale, to where the boy with the shining pail was milking the cow with the brindled tail. The bee lit down on the cow's right ear, her heels flew up through the atmosphere, and through the leaves of a big oak tree the boy sailed into eternity.

The Bible.

Viewed merely as a human or literary production, the bible is a marvelous book, and without a rival. It embraces works of forty authors, representing the extremes of society, from the throne of a king to the boat of a fisherman; it was written during a long period of sixteen centuries, on the banks of the Nile, in the desert of Arabia, in the land of promise, in Asia Minor, in classical Greece and imperial Rome. It commences with the creation and ends with the final glorification, after describing all the intervening stages in the relations of God and the spiritual composition: it raises to the highest heights and desends to the very lowest depth of humanity; it measures all states and conditions of life; it is acquainted with every grief and every woe; it touches every chord of sympathy; it contains the spiritual biography of every human heart; it is suited to every class of society; and can be read with the same interest and profit by the king and the beggar, by the philosopher and the child; it is as universal as the race, and reaches beyond the limit of time into the regions of eternity.

Of all the books in the world the bible is the only one of which we never tire. but which we admire more and more in porportion as we use it, Like the diamond, it casts its luster in every direction; like a healing herb, the harder it is pressed, the sweeter is its fragrance.

THE FARM.

Mixed Ration for Milk.

The relative value of corn, oats and bran to each other for milk production cannot be well stated; it would depend upon the quality of hay, straw, cornstalks or other forage fed with them. Corn, or what is much better, Indian meal, alone is too fattening to be fed for milk, as its tendency is to make fat and flesh rather than milk; while bran alone is not hearty enough to make milk and flesh at the same time; wheat middlings or shorts would be better. The two combined, say one-fourth Indian meal and three-fourths bran, would be a tolerably good ration. Oats, whole or ground, is an excellent ration for milk; but perhaps a better one would be a mixture in the following proportions fed night and morning, with hay alone at noon:

One quart Indian meal to two quarts oat meal and two quarts wheat bran. The grain of the two former may be mixed at the rate of one of corn to two of oats and ground together, and then two quarts of bran be added to every three quarts of this provender. If a pint of oil or linseed meal, or half a pint of cottonseed meal could be added to every five quarts of the above mixture, it would increase the value of the ration considerably, and assist much in the digestion of all other food and keep the bowels in fine condition. If linseed meal cannot be obtained easily, endeavor to get some flaxseed, from which this is made, and grind it with the corn and oats at the rate of four quarts to the bushel of the two latter. Do not feed cottonseed whole, for although this is done in the South it is dangerous, and sometimes causes death from indigestion.

In feeding meal it is much better to mix with hay cut up short in a straw-cutter; a half bushel of this to every five or six quarts of the mixture of meals and bran. In doing this spread the hay out well in a wide tub or trough, sprinkle the meal, etc., over it, then wet well with pure water, mix all up together and feed. The benefit of feeding meal and hay together thus is, that the cows retain the ration in their first stomach till all is thoroughly digested; but if the meal is fed alone it is apt to pass too rapidly into the third stomach and more or less be voided undigested, consequently being something of a waste of food, except adding to the richness of the manure.

In chopped cornstalks, of large growth, the only part of them of any value is the leaves and the stalk cut off above the ear. The stalk below the ear is little more nutritious than so much wood or sawdust. Cornstalks of the sweet varieties which grow from five to six feet high, and cut as they begin to silk, or when the ear is soft and in the milk, are very valuable fodder, nearly equal to the best of hay for making milk, and cows, and indeed stock of all kinds, eat them either green or when properly cured with great avidity. If any cow of the herd happens to be in poorer flesh than the others, it might be advisable to give her two quarts of Indian meal instead of only one in the above ration, till her condition improves enough to find one quart sufficient to keep her in good order.

Stock Notes.

It will not hurt to have line upon line and precept upon precept concerning a supply of pure water for farm animals. In some parts but few creeks afford decent water, being mostly filled, not by springs, but by the water which rushes from the land, full of varied impurity, after each rain, and soon recedes into stagnant pools to becomes less foul. Very few ponds are more commendable. It costs money to dig a well, and water is drawn from it at the expense of labor. But it is more economical to expend this money and this labor, than to compel the farm animals to drink stagnant water from a pool or pond. A complete pumping outfit, including valve tanks, can be got for one hundred dollars, and should be had where considerably stock is kept. If you pump the water by hand, put a roof over the well, to protect you from the sun or rain.

I find that the most progressive veterinarians do not sling animals with broken limbs, much less do they give such animals up to die. An animal with a broken limb will not put any weight on that limb, hence there is really no need of swinging it off the ground; and it is more at ease standing on three legs than suspended by bands across its belly. The limb must be adjusted to bring the broken ends of the bone together, and held in place by splints. Wet paper bandages are also recommended. Dip the strips of paper into paste made of calcined plaster of paris. This paste soon sets and makes a stiff, permanent bandage, which will hold the bone in place until it heals. The paper is covered with a cloth. In cases of severe or compound fracture, an opening in the bandages must be left for the escape of pus.

Mid-Ocean Harbors of Refuge.

The loss of the Oregon has alarmed the thousands of rich people who yearly cross the Atlantic, for the fact has come to light that none of the large ocean steamers carry boats enough to save more than one-third of the passengers. There were nearly nine hundred persons on board the Oregon, but only boats enough for three hudred and fifty: and yet that ill-fated vessel was better furnished than the great majority of ocean carriers. It seems the American maritime laws provide for floats and rafts in addition to the boats; but as they have no sea-going steamers, except along the coast, the traveling public does not benefit by their forethought. An English inventor suggests that a number of hollow steel floats, each eighty feet square, might be anchored in mid-ocean, bearing sixty foot light-towers. These might be only a few hundred miles apart, and would serve as harbors of refuge in the event of shipwreck, as well as places for the transmission of shipping-news, by telegraph, and for weather stations. The cable companies could afford to pay the expense of running them by the saving that would be effected in the use of relay instruments. Of course, this would necessitate the ships keeping on one route going and coming. Undoubtedly something of this kind will be done in the course of time. Indeed, these artificial islands might be used as sanitariums, as there are certain forms of sickness which are benefited by the salt ocean breezes.

YOUNG FOLKS.

Hal's Misfortune.

"Have you piled your wood, Hal?"

"No, not yet; but I'm just going to."

"Picked up your apples?"

"No; they won't take long."

"Father said we were to do our chores early, you know."

"Yes, I'm just going to."

But Hal kept on trying to make Carlo sit upright and hold a pipe in his mouth. The sitting up was a success as long as Carlo was held up, but he weakened down in a most provoking manner as soon as left to himself. The pipe fell to the floor and went to pieces just as Hal's father looked in at the shed door.

"All done boys?"

"Yes, sir, said Hal's brothers promptly.

"Well—almost," said Hal.

"The General and his staff, with a detachment of soldiers, are going to pass along the Winburg road this morning: I thought if you had all finished your work we might walk over there and see them. Hurry, then! there will be no time to lose."

"Hurrah! what a frolic!" The boys whose work was done ran to get ready. Hal knew better than to leave his work undone, for his father, with all his indulgence, was strict, and Hal had had enough disappointments through his heedless, dawdling habits to have taught him better.

"I'll help you," said little Tom, kindly, as he made a rush to pick up the apples. They were soon gathered, but in poor order, and then Hal insisted on Tom's leaving him and going with the others.

"I'll catch you," he said. "I'll ride the pony and go 'cross lots."

He piled the wood, but so badly, in his hurry, that it fell down and had to be done over. Then, out of breath and fearing he would entirely lose the fine sight, he threw himself, coatless, hatless and shoeless, upon the pony's bare back and rode quickly across the fields.

"I won't go around by the bridge," he said to himself. "I'll go by farmer Allen's ford; it'll shorten the way a great deal."

But as he came to the brook he saw that it was so much swollen by late rains that he felt a little doubtful about the wisdom of trying to cross, and wished he had gone around by the bridge.

"But it's too late now," he said. If I don't hurry up I sha'n't see a thing." He dashed in and urged the pony on.

"Hello, there!" cried a man's voice. "Don't you try to cross; it's too deep. Look out now! there's a big hole right ahead of you; if you get in it's ten to one you'll never get out."

"Hal reined back his pony, which was already floundering about as if in great doubt of his footing. From farther down the bank Farmer Allen came on his own horse, picking his way along the shallower places and growling at the folly and stupidity of boys.

"There!" he grumbled as he at last seized the pony and turned him the other way. "The next time you come foolin' round in deep water I'll leave you to get out as best you can—see if I don't!"

In a very crestfallen spirit poor Hal turned the other way.

"If only the General's a little after time," he said, "perhaps I'll be there soon enough yet. I do believe I hear the drum and fife now. Get up, Pony!"

Pony did his best, but alas! when Hal at last reached his brothers, whom he found in a state of delighted excitement, he could only catch a faint glimpse of nodding plumes over a cloud of dust in the far distance.

"Oh, if you had only been here. We cheered and waved our hats."

And the General took off his hat to us."

"And I'm going to be a General myself some day," added Tom. "Such a horse as he had—and a sword!"

"Always late, poor Hal!" said his father, looking pitifully at his boy's rueful face.

"When I'm a General," said Hal pettishly, "I'll take my own time to do things, and not always have to be hurrying."

"If you are ever a general or any other great man, my boy, you will find it your first need to be prompt and diligent in all you do. But be sure that no one who is a trifler and a laggard as a boy will ever be a great man or a good one, which is far better. A soldier of Christ must always be up and about his Master's business. If you ever expect to do Him good and loyal service, Hal, you must make your first fight against the faults that beset you now. When you reach home go to your room and learn this verse:

"'Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.'"

One Way of Getting a New Spring Hat.

"Don't pretend to be asleep, madam,' said young Freshie, the broker, as he returned from the club and awoke his wife one night just a week and a half ago. "How is it that I find a man under your bed?"

"Spare us, George! spare us! I told Charlie—I mean Mr. Skidmore—not to hide there. I knew you'd catch him. Mercy! mercy!"

"What—miserable woman!" shrieked Freshie, "have I detected you at last!" and he emptied his revolver under the bed. "Have I stumbled upon your crime? I was only trying to April Fool you, but—"

"Got fooled yourself," said Mrs. F. calmly. "And now that you've shot my bonnet box full of holes, perhaps you'd better fork out that twenty for the new Spring hat I wanted and come to bed."

And he did.

Joy in Every Drop.

This may be truly said of Polson's NERVILINE, the greatest pain remedy of the age. It brings comfort to the weary sufferer when failure has attended the use of every known remedy. Nerviline is an absolute cure for all kinds of pain, internal, external, or local. Purchase a 10 cent sample bottle and try this great remedy, Nerviline, nerve pain cure. Don't forget the name at any drug store.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

How to Iron Cuffs and Collars.

Have ready some irons very hot, only just not to scorch. And let there be enough irons not to have to wait for a second when the first is cool. These must be very clean and with a good polish. To insure the latter have a piece of beeswax, and when the iron is taken off the fire rub it over the beeswax, and then rub the iron on some crushed salt and it will run smoothly. Now on the ironing sheet lay a clean, smooth cloth; a handkerchief will do. Lay a collar on this, fold over part of the handkerchief, and iron quickly from one end to the other two or three times to dry it a little. While still steaming take off the handkerchief, stretch the collar with the hands, and iron briskly on the right side straight across. If the iron is not hot enough, or the collar too dry, the starch will stick. When the right side is smooth, without creases, turn it on the other side and iron more slowly so as to dry it thoroughly. The irons require constant renewing, as the damp cools them quickly. If any starch appears on the iron it must be scraped off with a knife before going back to fire. If you do not want shirts or cuffs to blister and wrinkle when buttoned do not make the first, or boiled starch, to stiff, and rub it well in. Of course you know that they should always be dipped in cold starch, i. e., clear starch mixed thin with cold water, before ironing.

How to Wash Woolen Blankets.

Select a bright, sunny day, with a brisk breeze, so that they may dry rapidly. Have the water as hot as the hands will bear, and dissolve the soap in the water, avoiding rubbing it on the blankets unless very soiled spots render it imperative. After rubbing it through this water, thoroughly rinse through two waters or the same temperature of the rubbing water. Wring as dry as possible; then let some one take hold of each end of the blanket and pull evenly and strong to bring it to its former size before drying. Pin as evenly as possible on the line, and let it become perfectly dry. Treated in this way no ironing is necessary. The secret of washing flannels without shrinking is to have all the water the same temperature (and after long experience I prefer hot to lukewarm water), and also to thoroughly rinse all soap from the blanket.

Receipts.

Tomato soup made of canned tomatoes: One pint of canned tomatoes and one quart of boiling water. As soon as this boils add one small teaspoonful of soda; then add one pint of milk, and salt and pepper to taste. After this boils, sift in the crumbs of eight butter-crackers rolled fine.

LEMON PICKLE.—The fruit should be small, with thick rinds. Rub them with a piece of flannel; then slit them down in quarters, but not quite through the pulp, fill the slits with salt hard pressed in; set them upright in a pan for four or five days until the salt melts; turn them three days until they become tender in their liquor. Then make enough pickle to cover them of ripe vinegar, the rinds of the lemons, Jamaica pepper and ginger; boil and skim it. When cold put it over the lemons.

ROCK-WORK.—One quart of milk, five eggs, six tablespoonfuls of sugar, vanilla or other essence. Heat the milk; pour upon the beaten yolks and sugar. Cook until the custard begins to thicken. Pour out, and, when cold, flavour and pour into a glass bowl. Whip the whites stiff with two spoonfuls of sugar, flavor, and poach by laying, a spoonful at a time, upon boiling milk, and, carefully withdrawing the spoon from underneath, leaving the oval mass of meringue floating upon the surface. Turn it over when one side is done, and presently take it up and lay upon the custard. Heap them irregularly on the top, and let all get cold before serving. Pass light cakes with this custard.

MARBLED CREAM CANDY.—Four cups of white sugar, one cup rich sweet cream, one cup water, one tablespoonful butter, one tablespoonful vinegar, bit of soda the size of a pea, stirred in cream, vanilla extract, three tablespoonfuls of chocolate grated. Boil all the ingredients except half the cream, the chocolate and vanilla together very fast until it is a thick, ropy sirup. Heat in a separate saucepan the reserved cream, into which you must have rubbed the grated chocolate. Let it stew until quite thick, and when the candy is done add a cupful of it to this, stirring in well. Turn the uncolored sirup out upon broad dishes, and pour upon it here and there, great spoonfuls of the chocolate mixture. Pull as soon as you can handle it with comfort, and with the tips of your fingers only. If deftly manipulated it will be streaked with white and brown.

A Puzzling Question.

Some persons seem wholly unable to cope with scientific facts, their inability being doubtless due largely to circumstances and their education. For hundreds of generations of men were puzzled by the same problem which now seems so simple to us. A teacher in a western county in Canada, while making calls among the people, came into conversation with a farmer's wife from Vermont, who had taken up her residence in the "backwoods." Of course the school and former teacher came in for criticism, and the old lady, in speaking of his predecessor, asked:

"Wa'al, master, what do you think he learned the scholars?"

"I couldn't say, ma'am. Pray what did he teach?"

"Wa'al, he told 'em this 'ere arth was round; what do you think of such stuff?"

Unwilling to come under the category of the ignorant, the teacher evasively remarked:

"It does seem strange, but still there are many learned men who teach those things."

"Wa'al," says she, "if the earth is round and goes round, what holds it up?"

"Oh, these learned men say that it goes round the sun, and the sun holds it up by virtue of attraction."

The old lady lowered her specs, and responded with this sneer.

"Wa'al, if these high larnt men sez the sun holds up the arth, I should like to know what holds the arth up when the sun goes down?"

Men of Genius as Gourmands.

Scott went to attribute his extraordinary capacity for continuous work to his good digestion, and the wholesome requirements of his appetite in his youth. "I have as keen an appetite now as ever man," he said, "But I know when to stop."

The Chambers brothers, during the years of their first struggles in Edinburgh, lived upon oatmeal, with a meal of meat once a week. To that early discipline they were wont to attribute their vigorous health in old age.

Mirabeau is stated to have been an enormous feeder, eating as much at a meal as would suffice three ordinary men. Talleyrand was also a noted gourmand. Goethe and Napoleon ate large quantities of food, but cared little for the quality. Prince Bismarck is noted for his appetite, which is insatiable; but his food is of the simplest quality.

Many anecdotes are told of the gross delight in eating of the two Dumas, father and son, one of which is that the younger, being overtaken by a storm, took refuge in a hotel near Paris. Twenty-four turkeys were hanging upon the spit.

"And all for a single traveller," explained the host. "C'est mon pere!" exclaimed Alexandre. He was right.

The fact is, that the man of genius instead of being, as young people usually suppose, a creature of delicate organization who can dine on the perfume of a lily, usually requires a large supply of substantial food. Intellectual work demands full nutrition in the stomach to repair the waste of brain-tissue. Hence additional caution is needed in young men who take up such work for life, that the apparently unnatural craving for food and drink, which follows severe exertion of the brain, shall be kept within wholesome limits. There is a great truth for all time in the legend of Circe and the swine.

Tramp—"Well, mum, have you got any more o' them buckwheat cakes to-day?" Mrs. Coldcash—"There's some cold ones, but I am afraid you will find them rather indigestible." Tramp—"Oh, I don't expect to eat 'em." Mrs. Coldcash—"Don't expect to eat 'em?" Tramp—"No'm. You see my darter has took to painting, and she finds 'em very convenient to use for placques!"

Prematurely Aged.

Many a woman is robbed of these charms which the gentler sex value so highly, and made old before her time by functional irregularities. To such the bloom of youth may be restored by the use of a remedy which has stood the test of time and which is to-day acknowledged to be without an equal as a cure for all female weaknesses—Dr. Pierce's "Favorite Prescription." "Gentle as the Breeze of Evening."

This line of an old hymn is quite appropriate when applied to "Pleasant Purgative Pellets." "I dont like to take pills if I can avoid it," we often hear persons say, "because they constipate me so." Now the "Pellets" never do this. They are so gentle and mild that their effect is almost precisely similiar to a natural movement of the bowels, and no unpleasant effects are left behind.

POISONED.

The Housekeeper's Story.

"Well, marm, I'll never forget the day young Alex Linwood came to the hall. It seems he knew young Mrs. Ainsley when she was Miss Howe. Since her marriage he had been on the continent, and of course when he came home he called to see her, although not knowing her husband was dead. Madame was standing in the centre of the room when he came in; when she saw him she gave a little cry and met him, with both hands outstretched, for her whole face lit up till she looked really pretty.

"It was easy to see she loved him, for she took no pains to hide it. He was very much surprised to hear of the old squire's death and seemed very sorry. He was not long there when Miss Una, the squire's daughter, rode up to the hall. Dismounting, she went into the parlor, not knowing any one was there. I never saw her look so well. I think Alex fell in love with her at once.

"He came very often after that, and even Mrs. Ainsley saw how much he loved Una. He seemed unable to exist without her, and but a short time passed before my darling told me they were engaged.

"One night in summer Alex and Una had been walking in the garden. When he had left her and was walking away past the arbor by the gate all at once Mrs. Ainsley stepped before him; she caught his arm and said hoarsely: 'Oh, Alex! do you really love that doll-face girl so much? She can never love you as I do. I loved you before my marriage, and when you went away I knew you did not care for me, so I married 'Squire Ainsley. Oh, Alex! let her go and love me, love me!' Alex Linwood's noble face was very sad, as he said gently:

"'Mrs. Ainsley, I am very sorry for this; I hardly dare think how I should feel if Una did not love me. You say "Let her go." I cannot; she is my very life, the only one I ever loved. I beg you say no more. I pity you from my heart, but I have no love to give.'

"From that day Una grew weaker and paler in a strange manner until Alex begged her to see a doctor, but she always said she did not feel sick.

"I called Dr. Grey one day when madam was out. He asked Miss Una a great many questions and then begged to speak with me alone. When she left the room he turned to me and said:

"'Mrs. Willis, has Miss Una enemies?'

"Well, marm, the question took me by surprise, so I told him all about Mrs. Ainsley and Alex Linwood.

"'Well,' said he, slowly, 'I don't want to arouse suspicion against Mrs. Ainsley, but I think Miss Una is being slowly poisoned.'

"You cannot imagine my terror; he gave me some directions, told me to cook everything myself for Una, and to watch Mrs. Ainsley. You may be sure I kept a sharp lookout, but I never discovered anything. My darling was no better, so I told Alex he had better marry her at once and take her away. So the wedding day was set. The day before the wedding Una was taken suddenly very bad, so I sent in a great hurry for Dr. Grey; when he came Mrs. Ainsley was in the room. Dr. Grey felt Una's pulse, and then fixing his eyes on madame's face, said:

"'Madama, this girl is poisoned. I shall call my friend, Prof. Hague, and we will hold a consultation.'

"Mrs. Ainsley turned pale, but, composing herself, answered:

"'Certainly, doctor, if you think it necessary. Mrs. Willis always attends Una, and if she is poisoned I dare say she knows it.'

"When she was gone he left some directions, and went away promising to go for Alex. Alex came in half an hour, and the way he went on was awful; he took her in his arms and cried over her like a baby; he would not go away, but stayed up all night watching her with me.

"About 1 o'clock Alex insisted upon my lying down, so I went into the adjoining room and sat down behind the curtain. There is another room opening into this one where the medicine is kept. I sat facing this room and could see it through a slit in the curtain. All at once I heard a noise; looking up I saw a panel in the medicine room slide away, and Mrs. Ainsley came out with a lantern in her hand. She went to the closet and began rummaging among the bottles. I slipped out of the window and went into Una's room—the windows open on the balcony, you know. Alex was standing near the bed. I pulled him away, whispering; 'Wait a minute and you will see something.' I pushed him behind the bed curtain and got under the bed myself, and not a bit too soon, for just then Mrs. Ainsley came in with a phial in her hand; pouring something on a cloth she was about to put it on Una's face, when Alex caught her hand; she screamed and fainted. Alex took both phial and cloth and laid them away.

"Well, there is not much more to tell. You know how Mrs. Ainsley got crazy, jumped out of the window, and was killed; but, before that, she confessed that she tried to kill Una, thinking that if Una was dead Alex would marry her. She used to make Una inhale the poison, always going into the room when Una slept. Una was a long time getting well, but six months after Mrs. Ainsley's death they were married, and a happier couple never lived."

Thoughtful Benevolence.

This would be a glad world if every creature in it were to do all he could to lessen pain and increase happiness.

It is astonishing how much suffering can be prevented by a little attention of the right kind at the right moment. An audience of three thousand people may be kept in misery for two hours if the janitor does not watch his thermometer; or a whole play-ground full of well-disposed boys may be tormented by one half-civilized bully. On the other hand, a large party goes off beautifully, simply because the director of the entertainment has taken thoughtful pains to have it go off so.

Some people seem to have a lovely genius for diffusing happiness around them. They are themselves so engaging that only to be near them is a delight. Most of us, however, if we would enjoy the happiness of making others happy, must try to do it. We must avoid and remove causes of pain; we must invent and provide the means of enjoyment.

The most usual cause of failure in this particular is not thinking. The evening lamp is distressing a pair of aged eyes; a thoughtful person quietly places a screen so as to shelter them from the piercing light.

"Why didn't I think of that whispers the onlooker to himself. Thinking of it is the rare accomplishment. Anybody can perform the trifles of household benevolence; the merit lies in not forgetting to do them.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, one of the iron kings of Pennsylvania, mentions in his now celebrated article in The Forum two facts which illustrate what a little thought may do to mitigate the human lot. One of the workmen in the employment of his company happened to allude to the increased cost of groceries through having to buy on credit, wages being paid only once a month.

"Well," said Mr. Carnegie, "why cannot we overcome that by paying every two weeks." "We did not like to ask it," replied the man, "because we have always understood that it would cause much trouble; but if you do that it would be worth an advance of five per cent. in our wages."

The change was made at once, and now the custom prevails in many manufacturing centres of paying wages every week. Millions of men have desired that for sixty years. A little thoughtful good nature would have sufficed to bestow the boon two generations ago.

From another man, at the same interview Mr. Carnegie was surprised to learn that poor men who bought a few bushels of coal at a time paid just twice the price which his company paid. One moment's kindly thought remedied this grievance.

"How easy for us," said the president of the company, "to deliver coal to our men in small quantities at cost!"

So said, so done.

And as such ideas are exceedingly contagious, a very large number of iron masters now provide their men with coal on the same terms.

There are few things more catching than wise benevolence. It beats the scarlet fever. Despite all appearances to the contrary, the deepest thing in man is the love he bears his fellow-man.

"Ma, haven't I been a real good boy ever since you whipped me the last time for telling a whopper?' "Yes, Billy, you have; a very good boy, indeed." "And you trust me now fully, don't you?' "Yes, my boy, fully!" "Then, Mamma, what makes you keep the preserve closet in the pantry locked all the time, just the same?'

The Rose of Waterloo.

BY T. C. HARBAUGH.

How fragile art thou, little flow'r!
And yet how very fair;
The fragrance of thy one brief hour
Still lingers on the air.
Thy home is where the god of war
Trod down the brave and true,
And where went out an empire's star,
Oh rose from Waterloo!

The soil that nourished thee was red
With blood one summer day;
It groaned beneath its weight of dead
Where nations fought for sway.
The royal Timor of his age
Was conquered where ye grew,
To die within his ocean cage,
Fair rose from Waterloo!

The Belgian lion guards the plain,
And Mars' baptismal font;
The spectres of the gallant slain
Stand guard at Hugomont.
Thy sisters in the soft starlight
Receive the spotless dew,
And wonder where thou art to-night,
O rose from Waterloo!

The cannon ruts, those scars of hate,
Have vanished with the years;
The cricket calls his timid mate
Where died the grenadiers.
The soaring lark her matins sings
Amid the balmy blue;
With happy notes thy birth-place rings,
Sweet flower of Waterloo.

The lambkins sport where battle's wave
Beat high that fateful day,
And where the bravest of the brave
Went down, the children play.
The language that thy petals speak
They whisper 'neath the yew,
Till blushes crown the lassie's cheek,
O rose from Waterloo!

Now, as I look thee o'er and o'er,
And touch my lips to thine,
I hear the tide of war once more
Roll down the allied line!
But ah! the flags that floated then
Wave o'er a pensioned few,
And silent is thy native glen,
Lone rose from Waterloo!

What he Did.

The idea of refusing water to fever patients is, we are glad to say, nearly a thing of the past. The following incident, related by a sailor, serves as an illustration of the water treatment. "Some years ago, when we lay in Jamaica, several of us were sick with the fever, and among the rest the second mate. The doctor had been giving him brandy to keep him up, but I thought it was a queer kind of "keeping up." Why, you see, it stands to reason that if you heap fuel on a fire it will burn the faster, and putting brandy to a fever is just the same kind of thing.

"Well, the doctor gave him up and I was sent to watch with him. No medicine was left for it was no use—nothing would help him; and I had my directions what to do with the body when he was dead. Toward midnight he asked for some water. I get him the coolest I could find, and all he wanted; and if you'll believe me in less than three hours he drank three gallons.

"The sweat rolled off from him like rain. Then I thought sure he was gone; but he was sleeping and as sweetly as a child. In the morning when the doctor came, he asked what time the mate died.

"'Won't you go in and look at him?' I said.

"He went in and took the mate's hand.

"'Why,' said he, 'the man is not dead. He's alive and doing well. What have you been giving him?'

"'Water, simply water, and all he want-of it,' said I.

"I don't know as the doctor learned anything from that, but I did."

No Good Effect Perceptible.

The businesslike way that children have of considering the most sacred things is often a little startling to their elders. A little Lynn girl came home from Sunday-school one day impressed with her need of divine assistance to enable her to be a better girl. Her mother encouraged her, and explained to her how she should seek aid, but she said:

"No, mother, you speak to him about it; I don't like to."

A few days afterward she suddenly inquired:

"Did you ask him, mamma?"—at the same time explaining her question by an upward jerk of her thumb.

"Yes, my dear, I did."

"Well, he doesn't attend to his business very well, then; I haven't behaved a bit better!"

THE ELEMENTS OF TRAGEDY.

Mrs. Jollyboy: Is Miss Bellevillle at home, Thomas?

Mrs. Jollyboy: As usual! Why, I haven't seen her for weeks. Who did she go with?

Thomas: With Mr. Jollyboy, Mum.

A SNAKE IN A BOY'S STOMACH.

He Died of Hemorrhage Soon After It Had Been Pulled From His Mouth.

The almost incredible story recently printed about the death of a boy near Grand Falls from hemorrhage caused by pulling from his mouth a live snake which had grown to his fin proves to be literally true. The lad's name was George Muriehead, and his age 8 years. He was a bright little fellow, and lived with his parents on a farm about four miles from the town. Early last winter the boy began to act strangely sick. He had a most voracious appetite, and it was impossible for him to get enough to eat. His friends got alarmed about him, and sent for physicians, who began dosing him for worms. As the winter wore on the boy grew worse and worse. One day he felt something crawling up from his stomach into his throat. He almost choked to death, for the crawling feature tried ineffectually to come out by the nasal passage. In a short time the snake (for such it was) forced his way up the boy's throat and stuck its head out of his mouth. The lad's sister, who was near by, saw the head of the serpent just before it drew back into the boy's mouth. Very soon the snake stuck his head out a second time, and his little sister made a grab at it and pulled from the boy's mouth a live snake fourteen inches long. It had a piece of flesh attached to its tail nearly as large as a hen's egg. The boy lived a short time after the snake was taken from him, dying of violent hemorrhage. It is supposed that the boy had gone to sleep in some field, and that the snake had crawled down his throat. The reptile has been preserved in alcohol.

Aerial Navigation Again.

It really seems as if the French scientists have accomplished the first step in the navigation of the air. The Mongolfier Brothers were the first who made use of baloons filled with hot air to reach high altitudes, and to Messrs. Tissandiere, Renard, and Krebs is the world indebted for machines which will really travel to and from a given point, provided the velocity of the wind is not too great. In 1883 M. Tissandiere constructed a machine which made nine miles an hour. This attracted the attention of the French military authorities, and further experiments were conducted by engineers Renard and Krebs. These officers have made thirteen miles an hour with a manageable machine which they succeeded in bringing back to its starting-point. They found, however, that they could not overcome a wind of thirteen miles an hour, but those who have studied the subject say that so much progress has been made as to render it certain that machines will eventually be built which can hold their direction in anything less than a gale. What a pity some great American capitalist does not devote a portion of his wealth to perfecting this means of navigation! In France, unfortunately, all the experiments are designed for war purposes. The French wish in their next war with Germany to be able to destroy armies and fortresses by dropping dynamite and other explosives from the very skies. Were this matter to be taken up, it would be to devise a new and wonderful means of communication between the different parts of the earth. It would be delightful to live another century, when air communication will be as common as land or ocean communication is to-day.

Excuses.

Teachers who require written excuses for tardiness from parents of pupils sometimes receive very amusing notes. Here are several specimens from a number received by a teacher while he was teaching a year or two ago in a Western village.

"Dear Sir: Please excuse James for lateness. I kneaded him after brekfust."

A second note reads: "Please forgive Billy fer being tardy. I was mending his pants."

The third excuse goes more into details, but is none the less interesting.

"Mister Sir: My Jason had to be late to-day. It is his bizness to milk our cow. She is a tricky cow. She kicked Jase in the back to-day when he wasn't looking or thinking of her actin so. He thot his back was broke, but it aint. But it is black an blue, an if you don't bleeve it you can see. The pane kept him late. We would git red of that cow if we could. This is the forth time she has kicked Jase, but never kicked him late before. So excuse him for me."

A girl, absent for half a day, brought the following satisfactory excuse therefor,—

"Mr. teecher: Mi dotter's absents yesterday was unavodabel. Her shoes had to be half souled, and she had a sore throte. Her konstitushun is delikit ennyhow, and if she is absent any more you can know that it is on account of unavodabel sickness or sumthing else."

A boy absent for half a day laid the following explanation on his teacher's desk:

"Dear sir: Please excuse Henry. He went to Grandpap Dickson's funeral with me this forenoon I have been promising him for several weeks that he might if he was good, and he has been real good so I kept my word."

He Wanted No Tricycle.

This happened one evening, recently, not a thousand miles from Cambridge: Two tricyclers chance to halt by the roadside for a brief rest just as a group of Irish laborers were passing on their way home from work. Attracted by the bright new machines, two of the men paused a moment to look at them.

"If you only had a tricycle, Pat," said one of the 'cyclers to the nearer of the men, "you could ride to and from your employment.'

"Ride to the dickens!" said Pat, with a contemptuous look at the combination of man and wheels. "Do ye think I cam from the auld counthry to drive a donkey-cart, bedad, and be me own herse?"

Fire from Heaven.

At Beaver Falls, during a heavy thunder storm the other morning just before daylight, a huge ball of fire descended from the heavens, and striking near the Baptist Church, tore a hole in the ground six feet deep and ten feet across. Those who saw it descend say it presented a frightful sight, and when it struck it burst into a thousand pieces with a loud noise, the pieces flying in every direction, like hissing serpents.

The Standard.

MARKDALE MAY 27, 1886

THE 24TH IN MARKDALE.

The weather was all that could be desired, and the people aching for a holiday, consequently a large number took a day's outing.

The calithumpians made a sudden exit from their head quarters between ten and eleven o'clock. The front detachment comprised a caravan containing 18 dressed characters with brass instruments, drawn by a pair of Taylor's livery horses in full dress, and led by Captain Gzzixsistingtyongstexx, or R. O. W. for short, whose portly physique and stern expression were sufficient to at once beget confidence and command the respect and obedience of his subordinates. The junior band took up the rear as an Indian tribe and did their part immensely while the music would charm the heart of a teakettle. The parade extended through the principal streets to the amusement of the citizens and delight of the juveniles.

The general sports commenced shortly after noon on the agricultural grounds, the brass band adding very materially to the attractions; they did their part well and richly earned the numerous eulogies of the people. Over one thousand spectators were on the grounds and everything passed off orderly and without accident worthy of note.

BAZAAR AND CONCERT.

The annual bazaar, under the auspices of the L. A. S. of the Methodist church, was held in one of Haskett's new stores. The stock of articles was not nearly so large as on some former occasions, but a ready sale was effected for most of what was offered, and the results correspondingly satisfactory.

THE CONCERT

was held in Haskett's Hall, which was filled by a respectable audience. In the absence of Dr. Sproule, M. P., his continued parliamentary duties necessitating his absence, Rev. Mr. Casson took the chair, when a lengthy programme of a superior order was entered upon and maintained throughout with marked ability, while the attention and excellent order was the subject of general mention.

The choir gave the opening piece of first and second parts very creditably. Misses Ayers & Christoe, Flesherton, sang well and showed good voice culture. Cap. Jones gave "Committed to the Deep;" he has a grand bass voice, and won the applause of the audience. Miss Hopkins, of Flesherton, is a reciter of rare ability, and an excellent reader; she gave one of each. Mrs. Fox, of Toronto, appeared twice and was encored both times. She has an excellent and well trained voice, and handles her guitar to perfection. Her rendering of "The Cuckoo" brot' down the house completely and justly so. Misses Richardson, of Flesherton, and Misses Rorke & Ayers gave very appropriate and well rendered selections. Mrs. Geo. Armstrong's instrumental was very fine, few being sufficiently up in music to be able to fully appreciate her skilful renderings. Mr. James has a grand voice, and gave his selection creditably. Mrs. Trimble & Mr. Brown gave "I Heard a Voice," which was one of the pieces of the evening. We never heard Mrs. T. do so well, tho' she always does well, and is highly appreciated. Mr. Anderson enthused the audience with "The March of the Cameron Men" as none else can do.

The concert was a rare treat, to say the least, and was the best ever given by this society. Messrs. Rev. Wilson and Ayers gave a few appropriate remarks, after which the proceedings were brot' to a close by the singing of the "National Anthem."

National Pill are sugar coated, mild but thorough, and are the best Stomach and Liver Pill in use.

JUSTICE.

A communication from a Markdalsite appeared in last week's Durham Chronicle complaining of the Standard's report of a recent concert given under the auspices of Christ Church L. A. S. When we read said communication we were forcibly struck with the truth of a headline we used to have at school in our copy-book, "Children and fools should not see half done work." The writer sits in judgement on the report, and hastily mails his decision to a neighboring paper for publication, taking care not to give us any intimation that any dissatisfaction existed as to said report. Think of our surprise on learning that such was the case, through the medium of one of our exchanges, 36 hours after the balance of the report was printed and in the hands of subscribers. The writer also insinuates that had it been a Methodist concert, the report would have been a greater length (not less than half a column). Now, the writer, or anybody else, never saw in the Standard, a report of any concert, entertainment or tea-meeting, of any church or society, half a column in length; furthermore, we are prepared to prove that our reports of entertainments given by sister churches, have been noticeably longer and more complimentary than those of the Methodist church, so much so that we have been taken to task for so doing. The Standard is not a sectarian paper, and its course in future (as long as we have control of it) will be as in the past, no respector of sects. As regards the frequent mention of doings in connection with the Methodist church for some time past we have no apology to offer. There has been extra-ordinary doings owing to church building during the past year, and as a matter of course, there was necessarily more frequent mention than of other churches. Had it been another denomination which was engaged in building, or other important doings, they would certainly have had a simular prominence at our hands; and besides, there are often items of more or less importance in connection with other churches which we are utterly ignorant of until they are past and out of date, and doubtless others that we never know, which, if reported to us from time to time (as we have repeatedly requested) we would gladly receive, and cheerfully publish them, but how in the name of common sense are we to publish what we don't know. In conclusion we would say that we have always attended all the entertainments we could in our vicinity, even when the managers say by their actions—we don't want you or your report—as in the one in question; for, when the customery courtesies to the press is not extended, in the shape of a complimentary ticket, it is conclusive evidence that our presence or services are not reqnired.

WORTH REMEMBERING.

There is probably no better relaxing remedy for stiff joints, contracted cords and painful conjestion, than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It cured Mrs. John Siddell, of Orton, Ont, who was afflicted for years with contraction of the bronchial pipes and tightness of the chest. It is the great remedy for internal or external pain.

Holland Centre.

From our own correspondent.

Our station has been re-shingled, not too soon however, as the old ones had became so spongy when dry, that they were in great danger of fire, and in fact did ignite recently by a spark from a passing train, which was however noticed in time and promptly subdued with a liberal application of water by the train hands.

J. & A. Lilburn are adding a matcher and planer to their saw-mill. This was much needed.

We had in our town a case of shameful wife beating—the parties recently married. The boys say if it is repeated, his lordship will be compelled to take a swim in the mill pond.

The name of our Posa Office has been changed to Holland Centre, also the Station, in honor of which some of our citizens had quite a jubilee.

The 24th passed off quiet. Those who spent the day here appeared to enjoy themselves until late at night, when some of them raised cain generally, and made the night air echo with hidious and unearthly noises to the disgust of peaceful citizens. If it is repeated, we will publish names.

MARVELOUS

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

It is our painful duty at this time to chronicle the occurrence of two very sad events within the borders of our village last week. As already reported to you in our last, W. H. Colquett was then beyond hopes of recovery; the stern disease (inflammation) held him as its prey, and on Thursday night, after but a very brief illness, he passed peacefully away. Deceased was a hearty, strong looking man whom one would think had fair prospects for long life. How necessary to listen to the words in the good book, "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh." He leaves an almost invalide wife and three children. The sad event cast a gloom over the whole village, for he had almost sickened and died before all in the community had heard of his being ill.

Scarcely had the sad news of death ceased its effects upon the hearts of the people until the sympathies of the community were drawn out in another direction, when the alarm is sounded from one of our mills that one of our village boys had been maimed. Mr. Will. Campbell, who was employed in Mr. Bradley's saw mill, got his hand caught in the small button-saw, severing the most of the left hand and cutting several ugly gashes in the arm up to the elbow. Dr. Christoe was summonsed at once and dressed the wound. It was thought at first the arm would have to be taken off at the elbow but since, hopes are entertained of saving the arm and first finger.

Rev. Mr. Arkells, of Maxwell, conducted the funeral service of the late W. H. Colquett, and preached a very interesting sermon in the Methodist church after the regular service at the grave. The Orange brethren took charge and consigned the deceased brother's remains to the tomb with Orange honors. A large number of the brethren were present. The Flesherton Brass Band led the procession with very appropriate music.

The Hectic Flush, pale hollow cheeks and precarious appetite, indicate worms. Freeman's Worm Powders will quickly and effectually remove them.

Toronto's Great Musical Festival.

THE GREATEST MUSICAL EVENT IN CANADA

On June 15, 16, 17, the City of Toronto will join the ranks of those cities which have proven themselves centres of art, culture, and progress. A monster Musical Festival will be held during those days, consisting of one matinee and three evening concert. Itcis owing to the energy of Mr. F. H. Torrington, for many years conductor of Toronto Philharmonic Society, that this great musical event has been organized. An Association has been formed of representative citizens of Toronto, of which Mr. Gooderham is Honorary President, Mr. Samuel Nordheimer President; Messrs. James B. Boustead, J. Herbert Mason, and Philip Jacobi, Vice-Presidents; Mr. James McGee, Treasurer and Mr. Earls, Honorary Secretary. The public spirit and energy of those gentlemen has resulted in a guarantee fund of $25,000 being raised, and in the arrangement of programmes which have not been excelled in any of the large cities of the United States. The immense Rink of the Caledonia Curling Club on Mutual Street has been rented for the Festival Concerts, which will be given by a chorus of a thousand voices, selected from over twelve hundred applicants assisted by one hundred musicians, selected in Canada and the United States, while at one of the concertsa chorus of 1200 children, selected from the Public and Separate schools will be the chief attraction. These choruses have been in active and enthusiastic rehearsal for the past four months, and have reached a degree of efficiency which augurs well for the artistic success of the Festival.

The array of solo talent is no less imposing. Contracts having been made with Fraulein Lilli Lehmann, soprano of the Court Opera, Berlin, Germany; Mrs. E. HERE AND THERE.

While a Southern militia company was in camp recently near Augusta, Ga., one of the privates made more than his expenses by opening a barber shop, where he advertised "a shave and a hard biled egg for ten cents."

An express train on the Central Vermont Railway dashed round a curve the other day, and rushed headlong into a herd of cattle killing a dozen. Five animals were killed, but the train did not leave the rails.

A lady student in the Yale Law School was appointed to make an argument in moot court recently. A large audience was attracted, and the student did her part with a high degree of credit. She is described as very womanly, and handsome withal.

A writer in the Boston Transcript explains to his own satisfaction how the glass eaters chew and swallow glass. He thinks they educate their throats as does the sword swallower, and then introduce a tube which receives the glass and holds it until it can be removed without detection.

Georgia planters kill a good many crows and the way of doing it is thus described: "Catch one of the birds, tie it to your body, and walk through the field with your gun cocked and finger on the trigger. The cries of the bird will cause others of its tribe to flock around you and they can be easily shot."

There is said to be in one of the German wards of Springfield, Mass., a liquor club called "Wissenschaftlichedartoffelpfannenkuchenverein." One of the by-laws requires that a member must spell the name of the club after every drink. If he spells it correctly, he is sober enough and thirsty enough for another drink.

A lot of boys in Nicholasville, Ky., played at hanging the other day, and induced Walter Clarke, aged 12, to be the hangee. He stuck his head in the noose and a boy kicked a barrel out from under him, and then his companions ran away and left Walter kicking in the air. He was cut down by passing men, but was unconscious for several hours.

A box was received at the U. S. Government Redemption office the other day which contained scraps of burnt paper, which the sender said had been bills amounting to $10,000, which had accidentally been burned and which he wanted redeemed. It did not take an expert long to determine that the contents of the box were pieces of common writing paper and a few two-dollar bills that had been burned and mixed.

The sixteen-year-old daughter of William Ferdyce of Wabash, Ind., rather enjoyed the company of Al. Watkins, a bartender of that town and a married man. One evening recently while the twain were walking together Mr. Fordyce overtook them, and with a pocketknife cut Mr. Watkins so badly that he is likely to die. Fordyce, who has been arrested, says that he was only doing his duty and was protecting his daughter's good name.

A Spanish vessel laden with molasses went ashore on the Florida coast some days ago, and all but one of the crew escaped, thanks to the assistance of the residents of that neighborhood. When the wreck broke up and casks of molasses began to come ashore, the Captain and the crew stood by with axes and broke them up as fast as they came within reach, refusing even the empty casks to the men who so recently helped save their lives.

Aeronaut Wells of Indianapolis says that he once made an ascent from Buenos Ayres, and while far above the La Plata River saw the sun set. Soon after the wind ceased and the balloon went down to the water. He threw out all ballast, and then, sitting in the hoop, cut away the car. At this the balloon shot up to such a height that the sun, which had set hours before to the persons below him, again appeared. The effect was as if the sun was rising in the west.

Mrs. Mary Pollard is called a representative woman of Maine. She lives in Skowhegan, and superintends a farm of 200 acres. Last summer, besides doing her housework, she made butter and cheese to sell and picked and canned more berries than any one else in that neighborhood. Through haying she milked four cows every night and took all the care of the pigs and hens. She lives five miles from the church, but she goes there regularly every Sunday. She reads the paper daily and is a well-informed and vigorous old lady.

Deafness appears to be exceptionally prevalent in Kennebec county, Maine, and in Martha's Vineyard. A recent scientific investigation of the matter shows that in both districts there is abundant evidence of heredity and especially atavism. In the families affected there were also found blindness, insanity, idiocy and deformity, and in some cases a long history of consanguineal marriages. In Martha's Vineyard the distribution of deafness coincides with that of certain soils, and its eastern boundary is also the typhoid fever line.

Tobacco blindness is becoming a common affliction. At present there are several persons under treatment for it at one London hospital. It first takes the form of color blindness, the sufferers who have smoked themselves into this condition being quite unable to distinguish the color of a piece of red cloth held up before them. Sometimes the victim loses his eyesight altogether. Although smoking is to a large extent the cause of the malady, and so gives it its name, heavy drinking is also partly responsible.

David Van Dyke of Mason, Ohio, 70 years old, owns a house and lot, and that's all; and owes a large debt contracted by going security for a friend. As long as Mrs. Van Dyke lived the house and lot could not be attached for the debt, under the Homestead Exemption law. But Mrs. Van Dyke died a short time ago, and suit was at once brought against the widower and the Sheriff advertised the property for sale. Under the law Van Dyke could not now claim a homestead, as his wife had died, and he had no minor children or unmarried daughter living with him. The only way of escape was to marry again, he thought, and so he went to Cincinnati and called on several women before he found one to suit him. At last he hit on Miss May Jones, who was willing, and they were married the 6th of last month. That was but a few days before the day fixed for the sale, and the proceedings in execution were stopped at once. The case was then argued in the Common Pleas Court, and the Judge has just decided that it was not necessary that Van Dyke should have been a married man at the time of the levy on the property, but that it was sufficient to entitle him to have the homestead exemption by becoming the head of a family, and that he is entitled to it.

"You had better put this down on a piece of paper," said Mrs. S. on giving her first order. "Oh, no," said Mr. S., "my memory is good." "Well, then, a spool of 60 Coates's black thread." "Yes." "A yard of not too light and not too dark calico." "Yes." "A small hammer, a can of peaches of the Pascagoula brand, a dozen small pearl buttons, five yards of cardinal ribbon, call at the milliner on the other—" "Yes," said Mr. S., hesitatingly. "A pair of silk gaiters for baby, a lemon, a good tooth brush, a pineapple, two ounces of sky-blue German yarn, an ounce vial of homœopathic nux vomica pellets, a—" "Wait a second," said Mr. S., counting on his fingers. "And a bottle of vanilla extract and a yard of triple box-plaited crepe lisse ruching and three yards of needle-pointed nainsook and—" But Mr. S. had seized his hat and was running for the station. What the poor man bought home was a yard of bedticking, three yards of black crepe, a bottle of vinegar, eight yards of nankeen, a scrub brush, a spool of green yarn, sixty spools of coat thread, a yard of very black calico, and a pint bottle of homœopathic pills. "There, my dear," throwing down his package triumphantly, "I don't think you'll find a thing missing. Who says a man can't do shopping?"

THREE VIOLENT DEATHS.

A Husband Kills His Wife, His Brother's Nephew and Himself.

The particulars of a triple murder at Lounsberry Station on the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, four miles east of Nichols, Tioga County, have just been learned. At the station mentioned there lived Horace Lounsberry and wife, and with them Horace H. Payson, a nephew who was a favorite with the old people, as they had no child of their own. Horace Lounsberry's brother, Norman, age fifty-two, the principal in the tragedy, several years ago parted from his wife, lost his property and since has drifted about, living for some time in Elmira. After a time he went to his brother's farm to live. In December he married Miss Presser, age seventeen, and began housekeeping in a small house near the home of his brother, the latter supplying him with money. Norman is represented as being jealous, because Horace Lounsberry showed so much favor to the nephew Horace and this with a quarrel which occurred yesterday between the murder and the latter about a horse is thought to have led to the tragedy. About 8 o'clock this morning Frances Payson, a sister of Horace, noticed Norman Lounsberry going into the woodshed of the house with a gun. Shortly afterward a report was heard and her fears were aroused as Lounsberry had been heard to threaten her brother's life. She and Mrs. Horace Lounsberry ran out and found Horace Payson lying dead where he had been shot while ploughing.

Constables Charles L. Dunham, of Nichols, and Spencer, of Tioga Centre, were sent to arrest Lounsberry. On breaking into the house, Lounsberry was found lying in the centre of the room with the top of his head blown off and the blood and brains scattered all about on a bed. In a back room was found the body of his wife with a gunshot wound back of one ear. The following note was found by Lounsberry:

"Send for Allen O. Lounsberry to come and take care of me, to Waverly. I am crazy. May God have mercy on my soul. I have a hope beyond this world and have prayed for Him to have mercy on my soul.'

One of the horses was wounded by the first shot which missed Payson. Notwithstanding Lounsberry's statement that he was crazy, it is believed that he was causelessly jealous of Payson.

"Keep Your Mouth Shut."

Dr. Hall advises every one who goes out in the open air from a warm apartment, to keep the mouth shut while walking or riding. He says: "Before you leave the room, bundle up well gloves, cloak, and comforter; shut your mouth before you open the street door, and keep it resolutely closed until you have walked briskly for some ten minutes; then, if you keep on walking or have reached your home, you may talk as much as you please. Not so doing, many a heart once happy and young now lies in the churchyard, that might have been young and happy still. But how? If you keep your mouth closed and walk rapidly, the air can only reach the lungs by a circuit of the nose and head, and becomes warmed before reaching the lungs, thus causing no derangement; but if you converse, large draughts of cold air dash directly in upon the lungs, chilling the frame almost instantly. The brisk walking throws the blood to the surface of the body, thus keeping up a vigorous circulation, making a cold impossible, if you don't get into a cold bed too quickly after you get home. Neglect of these precautions brings sickness and premature death to multitudes every year."

How he Popped the Question.

I was sitting by the side of Imogene, meditating upon the best manner of coming to the point, when she took up an orange that lay upon the table.

"Will you take part of this?" she inquired.

I assented, but my mind was running more on orange flowers than fruit. What she was thinking of I can't say. She divided the orange into two parts, and gave me one. A sudden inspiration came upon me.

"Oh, Imogene!" said I, "I wish you would serve me as you have this orange."

"What do you mean?" she asked quite innocently.

"Why, you have halved the orange—now won't you have me?"

I am a little oblivious as to what followed for the next few moments—only I remember that somehow I found my moustache in contact with her lips. We are to be married early in the Summer.

Barnum says he has wasted $5,000 on boomerangs. This is surprising, as it has been taken for granted that all the money invested by the great showman in hoss harangues has returned big dividends.

CANADIAN WOMEN.

Their Progress and Advancement Explained to the American People.

Dr. Jenny Trout, of Toronto, in an article in the Chicago Inter Ocean says of woman's progress in Canada: In education women are making steady advancement. As teachers they are gradually supplanting men. In 1854 there were less than 1,000 female teachers in Ontario, while more than 2,500 males were employed. At the end of 1883 their positions were reversed, there being 1,200 more women than men engaged in this vocation.

About a year ago a new theological college was opened in Winnipeg, the capital of the province of Manitoba. This is under Presbyterian control, and appears to have been intended for men. But it was soon ascertained that there was nothing in its character to prevent women from entering as students. One woman is now in daily attendance and doing remarkably well.

In the province of Ontario, the wealthiest and most important in the Dominion, the women have for years made commendable and continued efforts to gain admittance to the university. Finally Toronto University, which is a government institution, opened its doors, and attended its lectures last winter. They demonstrated at the examanations that they were fully capable of performing the work which they had undertaken. Five of them passed with honors, two of these carrying off gold medals, while another now enjoys the distinction of being the first woman in the province who has qualified for the position of principal in the high schools or collegiate institutes. In view of these facts it is not surprising that the 400 gentlemen attending this university should treat the dozen ladies with the greatest respect and courtesy. No doubt their number will be largely augmented this winter. The experiment of educating both sexes in the same classes has been so satisfactory that the government and the college council are preparing better accomodation for women next session. The government has provided an efficient superintendent for them, and if they distinguish themselves as in the past winter they will enjoy still greater advantages. At the last matriculation examination twenty-one girls applied. Among this number was a colored girl, who will attend the college.

McGill University, of Montreal, which first opened its doors to women about a year ago, has received another munificent donation of $50,000, making in all something over $100,000 invested in that city for the higher education of women. Progress is also being made in the medical education of women. Both the Kingston and Toronto have had an increased attendance during the past winter. The former is disadvantageously located, but this is more than compensated for by the fact that it is on a decidedly better financial basis than the latter. It has, too, a more liberal charter, being controlled by women, consequently it has the largest patronage. In a word, it is a women's college, while the other is largely a man's college for women.

The business colleges have each year an increased attendance of women who are gradually becoming more popular in offices, stores, etc., than they were some years ago; indeed they are becoming more numerous in all places where skill is of more importance than muscle.

The bee industry is growing rapidly in Canada. This is largely owing to the attention it has received from women during the past few years.

I very much regret that I cannot furnish, as requested, the statistical information as to the employment of labor, etc. No additional figures in this department have been furnished by the Government since the publication of my report last year. However, from the above it will be readily seen that our women have advantages that will compare favorably with those of any country similar in population and wealth. They have, I think, no cause to be ashamed of Canada.

UNDER THE SEA.

A Diver Who Unexpectedly Met With Dead Bodies.

"Did you ever come across any dead bodies in the water?" asked the reporter.

"Oh, yes, often," was the reply. "I have been sent to search for them, and I have run against them unexpectedly. There are some of these things I would rather not talk about, but there are some instances of finding corpses that I can recall and don't mind mentioning. When I was in the Irish service I went down in eighty-five feet of water to look after the body of a young gentleman who was drowned when out gunning in a boat with his sweetheart. The first day I went down I found his gun, and after that I walked about the bottom for five days without coming upon the body. At last I discovered it held tightly in between two rocks, with the game bag lying beside it.

"Another time when I was diving off the pier at Dungeness, England, when I reached the bottom I noticed an object leaning against one of the dock piles, which I took to be a bag of coal, like one of those used on British steamers. I went up to it and took hold of it, when it loosed from its mooring and the ghastly face of a dead man bobbed up close to my own. I recovered from my horror in a moment, and took the body in my arms and brought it to the surface. It proved to be the body of a man who had disappeared some time before.

"A diver has got to get used to meeting queer things," he concluded. "Dead men are foreigners under the sea as much as the divers are, but there are some of the natives that are pretty nasty. I have never been attacked by any kind of a fish, but I have met some sharks that made me feel unpleasantly. I always carry a short, double bladed knife in a little case on my wrist. I can get it out in two twists of a screw, and it is a useful thing to have about when a shark is around. I stabbed a monster with it in Hong Kong harbor, but the animal did not attack me. He was probably scared by the ugliness of the diver's dress. I don't believe a fish would attack me, but there is always a chance of his being able to cut the air pipe."

Married People Would Be Happier

If expenses were proportioned to receipts.

If each would try and be a support and comfort to the other.

If each remembered that the other was a human being and not a machine.

If each were as kind to the other as when they were lovers.

If foul and provisions were laid in during the high tide of summer work.

If both parties remembered that they married for worse as well as for better.

If men were as thoughtful for their wives as they were for their sweethearts.

If there were fewer silk and velvet street costumes, and more plain, tidy house dresses.

If there were fewer "p'ease darlings" in public, and more common manners in private.

If masculine bills for Havanas and feminine ditto for rare laces were turned into the general fund until such time as they could be incurred without risk.

If men would remember that a woman cannot be always ready when he will—cook the dinner, answer the door-bell just a dozen times, and get rid of a neighbor who has dropped in, tend a sick baby, tie up the cut finger of a two-year old, tie up the head of a six-year old ready for school, to say nothing of cleaning, sweeping, dusting, etc. A woman with all this to contend with may claim it as a privelege to look and feel tired sometimes, and a word of sympathy would not be too much to expect from the man who, during the honeymoon, would not let her carry as much as a sunshade.

DIAMONDS OF THOUGHT.

Speak as you think, be what you are, pay your debts of all kinds. I prefer to be owned as sound and solvent, and my word as good as my bond, and to be what cannot be skipped, or dissipited or undermined, to all the eclat in the universe.—Emerson.

We do not always work wisely or well. Some attempt too many things, and so accomplish nothing satisfactorily; some attempt what they are not fitted for, and therefore fail; while many pass their entire lives in an eager and nervous strain, alternated with fretful despondency, because they cannot reach the impossible.

An idle word may be seemingly harmless in its utterance; but let it be fanned by passion, let it be fed by the fuel of misconception, of evil intention, of prejudice, and it will soon grow into a sweeping fire that will melt the chains of human friendship, that will burn to ashes many cherished hopes, and blacken more fair names than one.

Such houses may men build for themselves and such lives may they live in them, that at last calm shall be breathed upon the sea of lawless passion, and the winter of the world shall be changed into such halcyon days that the birds of the air may have their nests in peace, and the Son of Man where to lay His head.—Ruskin.

How many are familiar with the language of the cross, with the terms sacrifice, self-denial, and self-crucifixion, who know nothing practically of what they signify! The cross is made an ornament; it is wrought in gold and jewels; it hangs in pictures in elegant halls, or tips the costly church-spire. And yet how far is all this from true evangelical cross-bearing, or the meek endurance of divine chastisement, the humble and faithful performance of painful duty.—Dr. Kirk.

Cooper the Novelist.

The frailest thread will draw a man to his destiny. Cooper became a novelist through his wife's challenge to make good a boast. One evening, while he read a new novel descriptive of English society, he threw it down saying, "I believe I could write a better book myself."

"Let me see you do it!" said his wife, with a smile. In a few days he had written a few chapters, which she and several friends approved. Their encouragement caused him to complete the story, which was published at his own expense under the title of "Precaution."

The novel attracted little attention from the reading public, but it gave the young writer an inkling of his capacity for story-writing. During the following year he wrote and published "The Spy," which appealed so strongly to the patriotic sympathies of his countrymen that it became a once a general favorite.

The wife's challenge—intended, doubtless to spur him to use the talent she knew he possessed—made him the author of thirty-two works of fiction, five more than Scott wrote.

Moliere used to read to his housekeeper portions of the comedy he was writing, that he might learn, from the effect they produced on her, whether or not the piece would please the public. If she seemed to be uninterested, he did not charge her with stupidity; he erased the passage. If she laughed at it, he let the lines stand.

Sir Walter Scott read the hunting scene of the "Lady of the Lake" to an old sportsman. "He will spoil his dogs," said the critic, and Scott profited by the criticism.

While "The Pilot" was passing through the press, Cooper read a portion of it to a shipmate, with whom he had been associated when a midshipman in the navy.

When he came to the description of the ship's beating out from the "Devil's Grip," his shipmate became restless. Rising from the chair, he paced up and down the floor. But in the midst of his excitement, he retained the seaman's instinct.

"It's all very well, my fine fellow, but you have let your jib stand too long!" he exclaimed, as if addressing the pilot. Cooper accepted the criticism, and blew his jib out of the bolt-ropes.

"Mamma, please read to me." "No, my child, I can't read to you; you have been too naughty." "Well, I'll get Grandma to read to me then." "No, my child, I will not let your Grandma read to you." "Why, Mamma, you're a regular Knight of Labor; you're trying to boycott me!"

A German school teacher was instructing his pupils how to act when the Grand Duke should pass through on the railroad, an event which was to occur next day. "Remember, children," said the pedagogue, "as soon as the train arrives you are to yell as loud as you can: 'Long live the Grand Duke!' until he leaves." Next day when the Grand Duke arrived at the station, and graciously bowed from the platform of the special car, the school children made the welkin weary by yelling: "Long live the Grand Duke until he leaves!"

But, ...luck would have it, I was in the whole... ...trade, and one of our travellers—a ...clever fellow I always considered ...and so without doubt he was—had re... ...left, to set up in business for himself; ...showed me how it was possible to do ...more good with seven or eight hun... ...pounds, than just to get a miserable ...six per cent. on house-property. I ...wish to dwell on this part of my ...so will only say that I invested my ...fortune in the business, and at the ...the first half-year I received a divi... ...at the rate of twelve per cent. per an... The second half-year was more suc... ...still, a rather larger dividend being ...; and then, as assistance was requir... ...the fuller development of the busi... ...I gave up my clerkship, to take a more ...position in the concern.

...often surprised—at first almost ...at the style of people with whom ...business seemed chiefly to be tran... ...; they were, with scarcely an excep... ...vulgar, common people, and more ...to drinking and smoking than is cus... ...even in the wine trade—as I had ...used to it. Among them was one ...man—he could not have been thirty ...used to come in frequently, and whom ...disliked greatly; but my partner ...him as the very impersonation of ...and honour. His name was Scate, ...understood that he represented an in... ...firm in the City. Whether my ...had spoken well of me to Mr. Scate, ...I did not know, but the latter was ...very courteous to me—after his style. ...hardly tell what he came for, but ..., from occasional hints, that there ...money transactions between him and ...mer; but the latter always laughed ...inquiries, and said I should soon see ...his business was. I certainly had an ...sion that, little as I liked the appear... ...of Mr. Scate, he really did come on ..., which was more than I could be... ...of many of our visitors, and was part... ...ed to credit what my partner said ...extensive transactions.

...ll, one day, five weeks after my last ...had was received, I found, on arriving ...office, a letter from my partner, re... ...that circumstances altogether un... ..., and entirely beyond his control, ...compelled him to leave for America; ...omitted also to say that the stock— ...had been mysteriously disappearing ...—could not meet the demands and ..., and he advised me to put myself ...communication with some experienced ...,

...soon as I recovered from the shock of ...letter, I did seek a solicitor; but in ...spect I need not have troubled myself, ...least half-a-dozen experienced solici... ...put themselves into communication ...me, much to my discomfort. The case ...such a bad one; so many people had ...'let in;' the trading had been so ..., and the disposal of all the best ...so suspicious, that serious thoughts ...entertained of prosecuting me for ...; but this was happily abandoned.

...earned how near and great had been ...danger, from a clerk who was in the ...pay of one of the hostile solicitors. He ...escaped an acquaintance with me while ...owing me with writs and all sorts of pro... ...and worrying notices; but he was ...so cheerful and jocular even over such ...matters as that; and when drinking a glass of ...ale in the deserted counting house where ...the wished business had once been carried ...on invited me to cheer up also. "You're ...right; I can tell you that."

"I am glad to hear it," I replied, ...though my tone was somewhat doleful, ...I don't see how it could have been any... ...else.

"Oh, come! pull yourself together, Mr. ..." said the clerk; "you've had a ...narrow squeak, of course; but you're safe ...enough. They won't try it on after all."

"Try what?" I naturally asked; for up ...to this time I had not suspected the exist... ...of any such dangerous consultations as ...those of which I was so soon about to hear.

"Try what!" echoed the clerk; with a ...knowing shake of the head. "Come, that's ...good, mister; I like to see a man carry it ...off like that."

"Carry what?" I asked with some ...appearance of annoyance.

...The clerk, however, took no notice of my ...interruption, and proceeded: "You knew ...what they thought they could have you up for ...—conspiracy and fraud. But old Judahson ...was your friend—he was. He stuck up for ...you all through. Says he—for I heard him— ...'There's no conspiracy there,' says he; ...'the man's nothing better than a fool,' ...says he; 'you can all see that. Talk about ...conspiracy!' he says; 'why, I don't be... ...he'll get out of the concern with enough ...money himself a glass of ale and a sandwich ...further, when he steps over the door and ...puts the shutters up. The man hasn't ...brains enough to be a rogue."—Well,

...you see, mister, we all knew what they ...knew, that [illegible] ...judge of what a rogue was as any man on ...the rolls; so naturally he had great influ... ...ences. So he got you off in style; and I'm ...glad of it. There was, however, two or ...three there that didn't know the old man, ...and they were inclined to be nasty; but ...there was another party there who spoke ...up well in your favor. My eye! he did ...give it to some of 'em."

"Indeed," I said. "And who was ...he?"

"A friend of yours, I suppose," answer... ...the clerk; "said he knew you well in ...the business. His name was Bate, or Crate ...—no! Scate—that was it. I thought he ...was going to let fly at one fellow. It was a ...game! But when I see what they have ...all done, it strikes me you won't have a ...brass farthing for yourself."

My well-meaning although painfully vul... friend was right. My creditors left me ...no farthings, or any other coin; and so ...total was the collapse, so utterly was I in... ...volved, that all the furniture worth speak... ...ing of at No. 9 Victoria Louisa Terrace, ...Kentish Town, was seized. Our home was ...stripped from top to bottom; bills were ...stuck all over the windows; auctioneers ...came and brokers, and Jews, and shabby ...hangers-on—of every description, I was go... ...ing to say; but they were indescribable. ...Sympathising neighbors came in too; not ...to buy, but to peep and quiz and titter; ...for I fear we had been considered stuck-up ...people, and it was felt that a little reverse ...was rather good for us than otherwise.

However, the sale took place; went off ...well, I was assured, for in most sales the ...goods fetched fully one fourth of what I had ...given for them twelve or thirteen months ...before; and the auctioneer congratulated ...me. At last, all the hangers-on were gone, ...and the house was dull and void, save for ...the few things that were not seized, and a ...few other articles which one of Susan's aunts ...had purchased back for our use. I had no ...relatives. Susan's friends were quiet peo... ...ple, occupying a small farm in a Welsh in... ...land county; and we determined not to ...trouble them; so this aunt, who lived in ...London on a small annuity, was the only ...one who knew of our downfall. She, then, ...was the only friend we expected to find at ...our sale; but, to our surprise, another one ...turned up in the person of my former ac... ...quaintance and recent champion, Mr. Scate. ...Not only did he appear at the sale, but ...came up to me, and calling me "old fellow," ...said he was sorry to see such goings on in ...my house, that he knew all about the doings ...which had led to it, and considered I had ...been scandalously used.

Little as I had liked the man before, I re... ...membered his exertions with my creditors ...on my behalf, and was melted by his sym... ...pathy now; so warmly shook the hand he ...extended. "Now, old boy," he continued, ..."what would you like me to buy in for ...you? Just say the word, and it's yours, ...even if I have to kick the whole of these ...swindlers out of the room to get it."

I was more staggered than ever at this ...question, and could hardly get out my an... ...swer, that I would not trouble him.

He cut me short here. "Trouble! Non... ...sense! No trouble at all. I'll get some... ...thing back from their claws—There! he is ...just putting up that marble clock, and hark! ...that hook-nosed old villain has bid fifteen ...shillings for it! Why, it must be worth ten ...times as much." With this, he began bid... ...ding; and his style, I may even say his ...swagger, was so impressive, that the men ...allowed him to have the clock for thirty ...shillings; while I am convinced they would ...have run it up to treble the money with any ...other stranger.

So the sale was over; the brokers and ...all the attendant vampires had gone; the ...carts, which had been standing about all ...the afternoon, were gone also; but the ...marks of muddy feet over all the rooms and ...on the staircase were not gone, nor were the ...wisps of dirty straw which lay in every cor... ...ner and behind every door.

My wife and myself were sitting in what ...we called our breakfast-room, which looked ...out on the little sloping front garden with ...which all the houses in Victoria Louisa Ter... ...race were furnished. Not that we were ...looking out then; for the gas was lighted, ...the blinds were down, and we were seated, ...talking sadly enough, in the room, which ...seemed so bare and wretched compared ...with its aspect of a day or two before. I ...pretended to beat up confidently, for I saw ...poor Susan's eyes fill with tears when she ...looked at the naked boards where had been ...such a comfortable dark carpet; or glanced ...at the common wooden chairs and table ...bought back out of our kitchen furniture, ...and now forced to serve instead of our plain ...but handsome leather-covered seats. She ...tried to hide these tears from me, and every ...time she caught my eye she smiled; but ...her lip trembled so in the effort, that it was ...almost worse than the burst of sobbing she ...was trying so hard to keep back. The soli... ...tary item which reminded us of our pre... ...vious comfort and smartness was the marble ...clock, which ticked on the mantelpiece; ...and we had already said two or three times ...over, how greatly obliged we ought to feel ...to Mr. Scate for his kindness.

I have said I pretended to bear up cheer... ...fully; it was all pretence, for nothing could ...be more utterly hopeless than were our ...prospects; and what made us more miser... ...able than we should otherwise have been, ...was what had previously given us great joy. ...Susan expected to have a baby in about a ...couple of months, and what were we to do ...then? Before that time arrived, it was ...clear that we should find another home, for ...quarter-day would come, and it was hope... ...less to think of going on where we were. ...Our present house was large enough to justi... ...fy us in letting one floor—the card, indeed, ...with the simple announcement "Apart... ...ments," still hung idly in our window; but ...where was the furniture to come from?

"Don't you think, dear," said my wife, ...trying to speak without a catch in her ...voice, "that we might buy some plain ...furniture from people who will take month... ...ly payments, and so"—

I shook my head as she paused, for this ...was only another danger, a fresh running ...into debt.

"Perhaps, then, dear," she resumed, ..."some firm might take you as a traveller. ...I have heard that some persons make a great ...deal of money in that way."

I shook my head again. Some persons, ...no doubt, did well, but I knew better than ...she did, the long, slow, hopeless task it was ...for an unknown man to form a new connec... ...tion. "The fact is,"—I began; when a ...loud double knock [illegible] ...interrupted me.

My wife turned pale; so did I, as Lizzie, ...our little servant, ran to the door. Lizzie ...had begged her mistress not to send her ...away just yet; for, as she said, she had ...been in a many houses where they was sold ...up, and so didn't mind it;" and added, ...that she would rather stay with us for her ..."vittles, nor go anywhere else for wages;" ...so she stayed. When Lizzie had opened ...the door, we heard somebody inquiring for ...Mr. and Mrs. Matley. The servant's reply ...was inaudible; but the voice said: "Down... ...stairs, are they? All right; don't you ...trouble 'em; I'll find them out; they won't ...mind an old friend intruding." Then fol... ...lowed a step on the stairs, a tap at our ...room door, and then the well-known figure ...and face of Mr. Scate became visible.

"Aha! you did not think of seeing me!" ...he exclaimed.—"No! I thought not; but ...I got home early, and I couldn't rest with... ...out coming round.—Your servant, Mrs. ...Matley. I ought to apologise for intruding ...like this but I know you will excuse me. ...I am a plain man. Everybody knows me; ...and Ned Scate is here to say that he never ...heard of such scandulous treatment as your ...husband has met with, ma'am. That's what ...I am here for."

Although the man's voice, air, and man... ...ner altogether were terribly vulgar, there ...was no resisting this; at anyrate Susan ...could not resist it, and her tears broke out ...in earnest, and thanking him warmly, she ...invited him to be seated and stay a while ...with us.

"It's what I came for, ma'am, if you will ...excuse my saying so," replied Mr. Scate. ..."I came to talk things over with Mr. ...Matley—and yourself of course—and to see ...if we can't do something to make matters ...straight. I'm in rather a large way of ...business myself, and have friends who are ...very influential. They could make room ...for a dozen like Mr. Matley, and be glad to ...get such men. Yes, ma'am, glad to get ...them, for men like Mr. Matley are not to ...be found at the corner of every street. I ...saw him in business, ma'am; I know what ...he is capable of, and will take care that ...others know it too."

"I am sure I don't know how to thank ...you for this disinterested kindness," began ...my poor wife; "to strangers too, who"—

"Then don't thank me, ma'am," blunt... ...ly interrupted the other—"don't thank me, ...at anyrate till I have done something more ...than talk about my good-will. As for being ...strangers, ma'am, I don't intend to remain ...a stranger any longer. This is not a time ...to stand on a lot of ceremony, and Ned ...Scate never cared for ceremony. He's a ...plain John Bull, he is.—And now, gover... ...nor"—this was of course to me—"though ...Mrs. Matley probably don't go in for such ...things, I have taken the liberty of bringing ...round a single bottle of sherry. If the ...quality can be beaten in all London, I can ...only say I have never seen the quality to ...beat it."

Suiting the actions to the words, he drew ...from one pocket of his long overcoat, which ...was white or drab, and made him look like ...a grazier, a bottle of sherry; and then he ...produced a knife with a number of blades ...and odd appurtenances, among others a cork... ...screw.

All this was utterly opposed to our habits. ...We cared not for drinking at all, save our ...meals; and wine we drank but rarely. ...We, however, were hesitating, and restrain... ...ed by a fear of seeming ungrateful to our ...new friend. He had no sort of hesitation ...about him; so while we faltered, he had ...called Lizzie the servant, who at his com... ...mand brought two out of the few odd tum... ...blers which were left, with a wine-glass.

"Depend upon it, ma'am," said he, as he ...handed the glass to my wife with his polite... ...est air, in which—ungrateful as I felt it was ...to notice it—I could not even at that mo... ...ment refrain from seeing something of a ...swagger—"depend upon it that the worst ...thing you can do is to give way. I am sure ...if you keep up, your husband will keep up ...also. Why, ma'am, I have been in fixes ...twenty times worse than this, twenty times ...over, and I have got out of them—and here ...I am! my own master, and caring for no... ...body.—And now, ma'am!" continued Mr. ...Scate, "I have much pleasure in drinking ...your health, with prosperity to you and ...your worthy husband. Why, in days to ...come, we shall have many a laugh over ...these times.—Your very good healths, both! ...—You must not think, ma'am," continued ...our visitor, "that I have intruded upon you ...for nothing, or just to say a few unmeaning ...words; far from it. As I told you before, ...I have heard all about the shameful way in ...which Mr. Matley has been treated, and I ...have spoken to some friends already in his ...behalf. I hope you will not think it was ...taking too great a liberty."—My wife as... ...sured him that he added to the obligation ...by doing so.—"And I am pleased to tell ...you, ma'am," he went on, "that there is ...something more than a chance of an open... ...ing. I am not authorized to make an offer ...to-night, and therefore, looking at the mat... ...ter purely in a business light, I ought to ...have said nothing about the affair until it ...was so authorized. But—if you will excuse ...my saying so—I was so shocked at seeing ...these goings on, that I could not keep si... ...lence; and I thought you would be so dispi... ...rited at such misfortunes that you would ...be glad of even a glimpse of hope."

"Glad of it!" I said; "I am more than ...glad. I do not know how to thank you suf... ...ficiently for the interest you have taken."—

Just then came another loud double ...knock, and, as before, we heard Lizzie open ...the door, and a short conversation follow; ...then coming to the breakfast-room door, ...she said: "Oh, if you please, mum, it's a ...gentleman as wants to see the apartments."

"See the apartments?" we both echoed. ..."Oh, he can't. Tell him, Lizzie."—

"No, no!—nonsense! Excuse me for ...the interruption," said our new friend; ..."but if I were you, I should have him in, ...and see what he is like; I should indeed. ...It may come to nothing, of course; but it's ...a chance, and my maxim in business is, ...never to throw a chance away."

Just in the Nick of Time.

"Gentlemen," urged a merchant at a ...meeting of his creditors, "give me one ...week more, and I will be able to pay you all ...in full."

"What assurance can you give us," they ...demanded, "that we will be paid at the end ...of that time?"

"My store is to be boycotted to-morrow ...morning."

Ranching in the Northwest

From the Victoria (B. C.) Times.

The development of the ranching industry in the Northwest has been so unostentatious that few, have any just idea of the extent to which it has attained. In the grazing region around Calgary the number of animals owned by the various firms there aggregate 76,000 cattle, 10,000 horses and 13,300 sheep, of the value of $3,731,000. The yearly increase among the cattle is computed at 25,000 or 30,000 will be brought in during the summer, so that the end of this year will probably raise the aggregate in that district to 125,000. Sheep raising so far has given fairly satisfactory results, though some ranchmen complain that sheep graze so closely, as to destroy the roots of the prairie grass and injure the runs. This annoyance can be avoided by the employment of competent and judicious shepherds who know when to move their flocks. The ranching industry, at its present rate of increase, will in a few years make Calgary the Falkirk of the Dominion.

Ruri-Decanal Chapter.—An important meeting in connection with the work of the Church of Englad in this county was held at Markdale on Tuesday, being the semi-annual meeting of the Ruri-decanal Chapter for Grey. Ministers, churchwardens and delegates were present from different parts of the country, Rev, Rural Dean Keys occupied the chair. Statistics of the various congregations were collected, and suggestions discussed for rendering the different missions more efficient. In order to increase the efficiency of Sundy School work it was resolved to call a convention of Sundy School teachers in connection with the different congregations throughout the country, to be held at Markdale on the 9th of July. The next meeting of the Chapter was arranged to be held at Chatsworth on the second Wednesday in January. The ladies of Markdale congregation entertained the visitors at a luncheon in an evergreen booth built for the occasion.

June Roses.

Rich, blooming and variegated as the roses of June, comes the American Agriculturist for this month, with its one hundred original illustrations and original articles, by forty-four well-known writers in various parts of the Union, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The second paper, in the series of the Homes of our Farmer Presidents, will be written by Donald G. Mitchell (Ik Marvel); subject, George Washington. The accompanying engraving will probably be as large as that of Jefferson's Home, which was the first of the series, to wit: 27 inches long and 17 inches wide. These engravings of Our Farmer Presidents are to be presented to all subscriptions of the American Agriculturist as they appear. Price of the American Agriculturist $1.50 per year. We will club it with the Standard for $2 a year, each subscriber to receive both paper and the Special Engravings and Descriptions by American authors as they appear.

Killed by an Unmanageable Horse

Shelburne, May 28.—To day as George Gorwood, a farmer living out about three miles from Shelburne, was starting for home, his horse became unmanageable, throwing him out. His head struck the sidewalk. Drs Norton and Rolstin were in attendance but Mr. Gorwood died in about three hours afterwards, leaving a family of eight children. His wife was buried only a week ago.

YOUNG FOLKS.

The New Noah's Ark.

"What are you going to make for our fair, Chester?' The speaker was a very small young woman, with so much fluffy blonde hair hanging over her eyes that she looked very like the terrier curled up beside the work-basket, where were bunched bright bits of ribbon and lace to be turned into wonderful "nothings" for the fair.

"I don't know," was the response from a corner where Chester was supposed to be studying.

"A boy with a camera and a scroll-saw and a printing-press ought to do lots of things, Bessie Clarke says."

"Did Bessie really say that?"

"Yes, and she is to have a table, and all the money goes to the Children's Hospital."

"I don't care where the money goes."

"But you ought; it's so philan—something."

"Filling something?"

"Yes; poor little empty stomachs—I suppose that's what it means."

"Why should children in a hospital be hungry, when they have oranges and things? Aunt Constance takes dozens of them there."

Blanche was unable to reply, for she had come to a twist in her silk, and was struggling with a knot; besides, she always felt like a witness in court when Chester begun to ask questions.

"You will make something, won't you?" she said, after a while.

"I might make a book," said Chester, looking around as if for an idea.

"The very thing!—a picture-book, I suppose," said Blanche, eagerly. "Bessie makes lovely scrap-books with Christmas cards."

"Do you think I'd do that?" was the scornful answer.

"Why not?"

"I'm not a girl. I mean a real book, with a title and a preface and a 'to be continued'—or, no, 'the end,' would be better—and stories in it."

"Oh!" said Blanche, drawing a long breath.

"I can print it well enough; I have plenty of paper, and my press is all in good order. The type is a little mixed, but I can soon straighten it out; the only bother will be the stories. I hate to write."

"So do I; my fingers get so inky."

"That isn't the worst—it's the thinking more than the inking."

"Laura Jones likes it; she writes verses."

"So does Jack Vane; he makes up yarns by the yard."

"And Kitty Rogers's compositions are splendid."

"I won't have any girls' fingers in this pie; they can make pincushions and paint plaques."

"Oh, Chester!"

"I'll only have one story with illustrations, and a red binding and gilt letters. I'm going to see Tom Barker and the boys; perhaps they will help. When is the fair?"

"Six weeks from to-day."

"That's time enough," said Chester, as he put on his cap and went out.

He found Tom Barker and two or three of his other companions playing base-ball, but they were tired, and glad to have a chat as they strolled home. They all entered heartily into his project, and promised assistance.

"I tell you what," said Jim Nixen; let's have an editor. My big brother will do it, and we'll get the fellows at school to send in things, and the best story shall have the author's name on the title-page, and we'll print ever so many copies."

"All right," was the response all around. And then hours for meeting were appointed, and they resolved to call themselves "The Steeple-chase Printing Club."

The way in which pens and pencils danced about at the Webster School for a few days was something remarkable. Such knitting of brows and biting of nails and twisting of shoulders might have frightened parents had they seen it; but they did not, and so there was no suggestion of nervous maladies. Some lessons suffered, and much paper went into the waste-basket; but the editor soon announced the chosen manuscript, and the boys ceased their literary efforts for the more agreeable task of printing. But, strange to say, the editor had promised not to reveal the author's name. The story was called The New Noah's Ark, and the only name accompanying it was to be Chester Drayton's, the boys having voted that as he was the donor, this honor should be awarded him. The rest were contented to see "Printed by the Steeple-chase Club" in very small type down at the bottom of the last page. There were a good many difficulties to be overcome, and the boys worked like beavers under the direction of a competent bookbinder, whom Chester's father employed for the purpose. Perhaps the volume was a little rough, a trifle less beautiful than the finished works of experienced hands, but how proudly did the makers survey it! Copy after copy was turned off, until a goodly little pile was ready in brightest scarlet and gold; and never was boy better satisfied than Chester.

The Steeple-chase Printing Club went in a body to the fair—a handsome, valiant set of lads, full of fun and nonsense, but of courteous manners and gentle address.

The book was prominently placarded, and at the table where Blanche Drayton was serving, everybody was saying what a bright idea it had been, and how clever and funny the story was,

"Have you read it? How do you like it? Isn't it good!" said one to another.

"It is the best thing in the fair. There ought to have been a thousand copies; they would go off like hot cakes."

Chester could not help being a little proud as Blanche smilingly repeated all the kind things that were said; and Blanche looked so pretty as she gave a little sigh, saying, dismally, "None of my things sell so well."

"You could not expect them to," said Chester.

"Why not?" asked Bessie Clarke—a bright little wren of a girl, with a soft voice and sweet manner that Chester thought very winning.

"Well," he answered, in a patronizing way, "the things girls do are very nice, of course, but they can't come quite up to this;" and he looked at The New Noah's Ark he held in his hand with an immense amount of satisfaction.

Bessie's laugh rang out as softly musical as a wren's jubilant twitter when it has made its nest.

"Who is the author of this?" asked somebody.

"Oh, I must tell," cried Blanche; "I must tell. Bessie Clarke wrote the story."

Chester stared incredulously.

"She did—she did," nodded Blanche, and every one crowded around the young author to congratulate her.

Chester had a little struggle with himself. So the best of the book was not his, after all!

This was indeed an unwelcome surprise; but his better nature prevailed, and as soon as he had the chance he took Bessie's hand, and said: "You're a perfect brick—I beg pardon; but there isn't a boy I know who could have done it. Besides, the not telling was splendid, and I just wish my name was off that cover."

"Oh, no, no," said Bessie, laughing; "it is twice the fun to be anonymous; but when Blanche told me that no girl's finger was to be in the pie, I could not resist the temptation, and my brother George was only too glad to let me try. You must scold him."

But no scoldings were necessary. The fair was a success every way.

AROUND THE WORLD.

Portsmouth members of the crew of the famous war-ship Kearsarge at the time of her battle with the Alabama are planning to celebrate the 22d anniversary of the fight at Boston, June 17.

Telephone lines are being extended from the towns to the rural hills of Berkshire, for the convenience of summer boarders, whose entertainment is one of the most prominent industries of that region.

The snapping of a dog at her legs, though no bite was inflicted, so frightened a little girl in New Haven the other day that she became ill, effusion of blood to the head ensued, and she died in convulsions before morning.

The so-called peanut factories of Norfolk, Va., handle and put on the market a million and a half dollars' worth of peanuts each year. The factory is simply a cleaning, polishing, and sorting establishment, and the work is all done by machinery.

Two young women and one young man went boat riding on a recent Sunday, and the boat tipped over. The young man was tall, and by standing on tiptoe was able to keep his head out of water, and the girls hung to his hair and ears, and were saved.

A three-year-old youngster near Appomattox, Dakota, was lost, and, after a search of twenty-four hours, was found near his home in a badger's hole, into which he had slipped feet foremost, and which was deep enough to quite conceal him.

While a young woman was being taken in an express train from Boston to a reform school the other day she eluded her guardian and jumped through a window while the train was at full speed. The train was stopped, but no girl was found, nor has been yet.

Until very lately only one copy of the first edition of "The Pilgrim's Progress" was known, but recently two copies more have been picked up in London at sixpence each. One was immediately sold to the British Museum for £65, and the other to a London publisher for £25.

The Kansas City Times does not hesitate to say that the coming match between Sullivan and Mitchell will be a hippodroming fizzle for gate money, and remarks with considerable wisdom that "standing up against Sullivan for thirty per cent. of the gate money is much safer than facing Dempsey for blood."

It appears from a recent book on sea legends that their are many ways to raise the wind. You may suspend a he-goat skin at the mast head, you may flog a boy at the mast, you may burn a broom and let the handle turn toward the desired quarter, you may blow out to sea the dust from the chapel floor, you may stick a knife in the mizzenmast or scratch the foremast with a nail, and so on.

A small Waterbury lad said to a policeman the other day: "If you see a ladder up to my bed-room window to-night please don't say anything, or take it down. A lot of us boys are going to sleep together to-night and get an early start to see the circus come into town, and I want to get out of the house on the sly." The policeman is said to have been worthy of the confidence thus placed in him.

Mr. Brown of San Antonio, Texas, became angry and swore in the presence of Mrs. Williams. She objected, and he told her to help herself if she could. So she told her husband, and Mr. Williams at once loaded his pistol, sought Brown, and found him eating supper. "Did you swear in my wife's presence?" asked Mr. Williams. "I did," answered Mr. Brown. Thereupon Mr. Williams shot Mr. Brown dead.

Thirty-two years ago the father of Alexander Balles died, and after the estate had been settled, as was supposed, some papers and family relics were locked in a chest and given to the care of the boy's grandmother. She died and the chest went to the mother. Balles was married a while ago and went to housekeeping in Greenville, Mich., and his mother sent the chest to him. He opened it, and in the old family Bible found documents which make him heir to property worth $40,000.

A band of robbers, dressed as Indians, came into the little town of Peto, near Merida, in Yucatan. A travelling company were playing in the theatre, the best people of the town forming the audience. The robbers surrounded the theatre, a sufficient number of them going in and plundering every one of all the money and valuables on their persons, sometimes with violence. A party went on the stage, ransacked the wardrobe, and finally carried off the handsomest prima donna, Mme. Ruiz, and two good-looking chorus girls. During the tumult a son of Mme. Ruiz was killed, defending his mother, and $3,000 ransom for the ladies had to be paid.

California carries on a large business in sea shells, which are gathered on its coast and shipped to Europe. One firm has a contract to ship forty tons of shells every sixty days. They are worth from $700 to $1,000 a ton. They are used in all kinds of decorative industries, returning to the United States from France vastly increased in price when transformed into pearl buttons, brooches, shawl clasps, knife handles, or inlaid work. Tahita shells, large flat mother of pearl shells, are worth from $1.50 to $4 each, and the finest selected pairs are sometimes sold for as much as $50.

Oliver Hughes and Steve Connelton, lads of Sparta, Ohio, went squirrel hunting on Saturday. They happened to get into the same woods, and when they were about fifty yards apart Hughes sat down and began to fan himself with a brown handkerchief. Connelton, who had not seen him, saw the flutter of the handkerchief and thought it was a bird. He crept up, and when within gunshot was certain the flutter was made by two big owls fighting. So he blazed away, and peppered Hughe's head full of bird shot. Luckily his eyes were not hit, and the injuries were not serious.

Burglars entered several residences in Wilton, Conn., the other morning. At the house of Mrs. Clarissa Davenport-Raymond, the aged lady whose 104th year was completed on Easter Sunday, the old lady was the first to hear the movements of the intruders. With her staff, which always stands at the head of her couch at night, she rapped the floor so vigorously that the burglars departed without securing any of the family treasurer. She said that she was afraid they would steal her little Bible, which contained the family record, including her own birth at Stamford, April 25th.

Death of a Prince in Poverty.

The last Prince of Grusinien has just died at St. Petersburg in very straitened circumstances. Of late years the Prince lived quite poor in a suburb of the city Prince George of Grusinien was the last representative of a once powerful house. As a youth he went to St. Petersburg, where he attracted much attention through his beauty, the elegance of his carriage, and the splendor of his diamonds. He kept a great house and became renowned for hospitality and benevolence. On a single day, however, his wealth left him, and eventually he took to a couple of small rooms and live on a modest pension allowed him by the Government. He bore his reverse of fortune without complaining, even managing to devote a portion of his small pension to the maintenance of less favored friends. A Court lady of his mother, for instance, was provided with both home and necessaries for a long time, and this dependent, 90 years of age, ministered to the Prince during his last hours.

A Very Curious Community.

Early in this century a number of Germans, under the leadership of George Rapp, made a settlement in Pennsylvania, fourteen miles from Pittsburg. They aimed to imitate the example of the Disciples as related in the Acts of the Apostles. In other words, they established a community having all things in common. The family relation was regarded for a number of years, but finally the community became celibates, and the husbands and wives lived apart. As a consequence the membership became less and less. At one time they numbered about a thousand persons. All that is left is about fifty old men and women. The community prospered in wealth while it diminished in numbers. In the past its manufactures were famous, especially their broadcloths, flannels, and blankets. Some years ago they bought some wild land in Pennsylvania for the sake of the timber it contained. Subsequently this tract proved to be the middle of the oil bearing region. Riches poured in upon the community, while all the time it is dying out, because it made no proselytes and would not countenance family life. Visitors to the community tell touching stories of the hunger for children which these old men and women still feel. The babies and little ones who come to Harmony, as their village is called, are passionately caressed and wept over by these celibate communists. In passing it is worthy of note that the Shakers are dying out in numbers. They make few or no proselytes, and the only recruits they get are children they adopt from the alms houses. A history of American socialistic experiments, such as the Shakers, the Economites, and the Oneida Communists, would be very interesting reading.

Our Progress.

As stages are quickly abandoned with the completion of railroads, so the huge drastic, cathartic pills, composed of crude and bulky medicines are quickly abandoned by the introduction of Dr. Pierce's "Pleasant Purgative Pellets," which are sugar-coated, and little larger than mustard seeds, but composed of highly concentrated vegetable extracts. HOUSEHOLD.

Managing a Husband.

...of the greatest mysteries of life to ...and one that still remains so after ...thought and study on the subject, is ...how some women manage a husband ...charmingly, while others make such dele... failures.

I was a visitor on one occa... in a certain household, which I will name here, where the man of the house was not an object of the least solicitude on the part of any member of the family; in fact he was simply tolerated as a sort of ...night-horse to keep the family machinery going. The impression seemed to pervade all kinds of wife and children that he ...had down town all day "having a good ...time," telling stories and having innumer... "swipes" with that mysterious "other ...man," and that the hard, dull routine of ...home was the last thing he ever troubled ...himself about. I used to feel really sorry ...for him when he would come home at night ...with such a careworn and troubled look on ...his face, for I knew only too well what an ...exacting wife he had, who literally kept ...him under her thumb, who literally kept ...him under her thumb, who literally kept ...him under her thumb

MARKDALE JUNE 3 1886

ONCE MORE AT THE HELM.

It's about eight months since I wrote my last editorial, and as the boss is away to Goderich and won't be home for a week or more, I again step into his shoes. He didn't say a word against my last effort; but, by jove, old man Plewes wouldn't speak to me for months after.

Well, things have moved along about as usual. Our ranks have not suffered from matrimony or other natural causes to any serious extent—true, Hugh Mercer joined the army of benedicts, Jack Richards started a store at Rocklyn, and Frank Porter climbed a tree fishing for porcupine quills; but the rest of us are still enjoying single blessedness; how long the latter state of affairs may continue there is no telling; one thing is certain, some of them are in sore need of a housekeeper.

Since the skating rink has closed, there is but little amusement. Some are extremely hard against the Roller Rink, and condemn it in severe terms, yet we have heard others remark, and very truthfully, "How little drinking there has been done in Markdale the past winter," so that it was not an unmixed evil, to say the least.

Having been laid up on the shelf for a few days with a sick ankle, and having charge of the business and not much help, it leaves me in poor condition for editorial writing, especially anything komikal, so we shall conclude, and if C. W. does not send something in the shape of a leader for next week, perhaps we will try again.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

Markdale, May 25th, 1886.

To the Editor of the Standard.

SIR,—I notice, in last week's issue of STANDARD, an article attested by Johnson Wilson.

He states he carried the rifle, he loaded it, he fired, and the result. He states he did not know rifle was broken. It was not broken, but there was a missing part, the ejector, which it is impossible for any one who has seen a rifle, not to observe, and which caused cartridge to burst. The piece taken from Alf.'s eye is about quarter of an inch long, and corresponds exactly with space left open by missing ejector. He does not state how he got rifle. It was obtained without permission of owner, who had prohibited any one from using it, for above reasons. He also states trigger was filed and he started from shop. Now, he filed part of trigger himself, and did not start from shop till after the accident. I will also state that Alf. was not one of the party, but was working in shop, and followed them to the door; also, he did not coax or urge Wilson to fire, but he admits saying, after rifle was loaded, to "aim at a post," which other two witnesses corroborate. He states shooting took place in an adjoining shed. Now, it took place about 3 or 4 feet from our saw table and casting mill. The whole letter is evasive and though I do not admire writing about the affair, I am compelled to write, as it appears he wishes to shirk all responsibility, and put the whole blame on Alf. who has to suffer the consequences of the accident. I am sorry any one should think the shooting intentional as "Truth" in Flesherton Advance supposes from statement in STANDARD. I would also state that Johnson's letter is the first apology he has made so far. I would just here remind Mr. Wilson of the good old maxim, "Do ye unto others as you would that others do to you."

Thanking you for above space,

T. L. MOFFAT.

FREE CONCERTS.—The Wizard Oil Co. gave several open air concerts in our village last week. Their music was of a high order and duly appreciated. We believe not less than 500 people were present on Saturday evening. The concert company were invited to sing in the Methodist church on Sunday evening. The invitation was accepted. They sang several anthems, very choice selections, which were well rendered. The house was packed to the doors, the ushers finding it difficult to get all in. The Rev. Mr. Auld, of Eugenia, delivered a very interesting discourse upon the ministery of angels.

Mr. Buchannon, of Hamilton, Grand Secretary of the Royal Templars of Temperance, delivered a very interesting and instructive lecture on "Templarism and Temperance" in the Town Hall here on Monday evening last.

The town of Flesherton will be well represented at the Guelph Conference this season. Rev. Mr. Ayers, M. Richardson, Dr. Christoe, W. Clayton and J. W. Armstrong all left for conference on Tuesday morning.

Times are improving in this village now that the farmers are all through seeding and the mills have commenced operations again. The men have been on strike since the 24th, therefore can sing "The mill's to be closed."

Quite an exciting event took place last Sabbath morning, Mr. Ab. Hanley's horse, taking fright at a pile of wood, ran away, throwing he and his sister out of the buggy and injuring them to a certain extent.

Mr. Geo. Donkin, our respected miller, has taken his departure from our midst and gone to Shelburne, his place having been filled by Mr. A. J. Conron.

Two of our worthy merchants (one an ex-Divine) got into quite a squabble about some wood, but ended in nothing but some hot words. Mr. H. got the wood all right, and Mr. N. felt pretty bad, not so much about the wood, but the manner in which Mr. H. took it.

Mr. John Deacon, the well known sport, has been paying our town a short visit.

THE FARM.

Care of the Team.

It is astonishing how little care some farm teams get. They come from plowing or harrowing, all dusty, sweaty, and with skin worn off in places, it may be, by hard harness that does not fit. Into the stables they go; and the currycomb and brush scarcely ever touches them; and as for washing off the dried sweat, and rubbing them down, that is never done. They go into the field in the morning; perhaps they have been watered and perhaps not; and they are compelled to wait until noontime, when, if allowed to drink, they will take more than is good for them. It is only humane to manage someway that, on the hottest days, the work-team may have more frequent opportunity to drink than once at morning, noon and night. In respect to feed, let it be cut hay mixed with meal. It is most economical; horses will do best on it and work the hardest. It is an error to feed a horse all the hay he will eat. Make up the deficiency in grain; and, if oats are fed, twelve quarts per day is as much as a horse can digest well; and, unless they are digested, of course they do no good. Above all feed regularly, and do not overfeed. On the other hand, do not expect a horse to do heavy work on light rations.

The Apple's Enemy.

This, it need hardly be said, is the codling moth or apple worm. The only nice thing about it is its entomological name, Carpocapsa pomonella. This moth makes its appearance in latter May or early June, and it is well to be prepared to meet it when it comes. Traps have been invented for this insect, and various means suggested of staying the advances and preventing its ravages. Professor Cook asserts, that Paris Green and London Purple if mixed with water and sponged on the trees "it is sure to kill this arch enemy of our most valued fruit." He has found that a pound of the poison mixed with 100 gallons of water, and kept well mixed, is still effective to kill the larvæ as they attempt to enter the apple. One or two applications of the poison to the trees, made soon after blossoms fall, will thin almost to extinction not only the codling larvæ but all other insects present, as the canker-worm, leaf-roller, and various caterpillars. The probabilities are that in those localities where apples were so abundant last season, there will be few enough at best this year, and we can't afford to give many to the worms.

Potato Planting.

It is customary in most farming sections to plant potatoes in the early spring, and once for all. By this we mean that there is only one season of planting and only one crop to harvest. But in view of drought and bugs, a late planting, say along in June, might make a decided and desirable change. This planting leaves the tuber formation for early fall, about the time fall rains should prevail. Moreover, during harvest time, when grain must be garnered, is just the time when the potato crop needs attention; and if it does not have it, weeds will soon pre empt the territory to the disadvantage of the potato crop. But late planted potatoes will not need so much attention during the busy harvest season. The late crop can be dug and marketed when labor is cheaper, and the market is usually better. In order to insure a good crop at any time, the ground must be kept mellow and soft, and a slight scratching over with a cultivator, as opportunity permits, will have good results.

Feed for Butter.

It is not necessary to feed oily food for a large production of butter. On the contrary nitrogenous food mixed with selected food rich in starch and peculiarly well flavored fatty matter is preferable. It is a fact that oils taken into the digestive apparatus are largely absorbed directly by the blood and are carried, without change, into the milk, thus giving to the butter a flavor like that of the food. But when peas, bran, malt, sprouts, and other food rich in nitrogenous elements, and fat which have an agreeable flavor, are used with cornmeal or other starchy feed, the whole is thoroughly well digested, and pass into the blood and the milk in a changed form, and not directly. The butter is thus of a better quality than when oil meals are fed. The selection of food for dairy cows is a matter for the greatest care, and also for individual experiment. A good mixture of food for cows used for making butter is 100 pounds of peas, or Southern cow peas, 200 pounds of corn, and 260 pounds of fine wheat or rye bran, all ground together. To eight quarts of this meal may be added four quarts of thoroughly soaked malt sprouts and one of cotton-seed meal for a full daily allowance, divided into three feeds for a large full milking cow.

The Color of the Eye.

Some curious researches have recently been undertaken by Swiss and Swedish physicians on the color of the eyes, but without any apparent purpose. For convenience all eyes were divided into blue or brown, the various shades of gray eyes being classified according to the preminence of blue or brown in their color. Some of the conclusions from a great many observations are these: That women with brown eyes have better prospects of marriage than those with blue; that the average number of children is greater with parents whose eyes are dissimilar. In children both of whose parents have blue eyes, 93 per cent inherit blue eyes; but in children both of whose parents have brown eyes, only 80 per cent. have brown eyes. The above results were reached in Switzerland. In Sweden the discoveries were not quite the same. The women with brown eyes were more numerous there than the men with brown eyes, but brown eyes are apparently increasing there as in Switzerland.

The Port Physician at Philadelphia, Dr. H. Leffman, has been investigating typhoid fever there. From his figures it would seem that this disease is more prevalent in Philadelphia than in most large cities, and that it is steadily on the increase. This fact Dr. Leffman does not ascribe to Schuylkill water nor to sewer gas, but mainly to cesspools and to water from contaminated wells. A large number of the deaths are of recently arrived foreigners, who are most susceptible to malarial influences.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

There was an unusually large attendance as the meeting opened, and it was whispered from one to the other that Brother Gardner had something on his mind. His countenance had a serious look as he took his seat, and during roll-call he was busy with a letter. When the secretary had finished his call the President arose and said:

"My friends, heah am a letter from Asheville, N oth Caroliny, inclosin' the purseedin's of a late temperance meetin' held by de cull'd people of dat nayourhood, an axin' me to publickly state my views on the subjick of temperance. Not a man among you hez eber heard me preach temperance. Some of yen who war' drinkin' too deeply hev bin made to walk chalk, but I hasn't forced my opinyuns upon you. I see my cull'd friends alyin' in an' slippin' out of saloons, an' although I know dey leave money dar, which am sorely needed at home, I haven't a word of advice to give. I often meet a good man drunk, but I doan' chide him. I see young men gwine to destruckshun by de aid of whisky, but I doan' hold 'em back. Why? Bekase—

"1st. Advise unasked am words frown away.

"2d. To be known as a philantrophist am about as bad as to be known as a fool.

"All dat I could say or do fur a decade of y'ars wouldn't lessen de number of drunkards by one. De man who makes a practice of gittin' drunk am, in my opinyun, so low down in his moral natur' dat his fellow-man had better let him finish de bizness widout interupshun. Let me say a few words to de men in dis club:

"Do ye know what a glass of beer a day means? Thirty-five cents a week—a dollar forty a month—about $17 a y'ar Nobody stops at one glass. Jist make dat $34 a year.

What hev ye got to show fur yer money when de y'ar ends? How much better does yer breaf smell? How much stronger am yer musole?

"Fifty long ya'rs ago, when I was a slave-boy on de plantashun, I saw a specter. It had hands which trembled. It had hollow eyes—a toothless mouth—a face so drawn an' pinched dat a blue light seemed to dance aroun' it. I asked the name of de specter, an' an old man answered: 'Rum!'

"I hev seen dat specter almost' ebery day since. It has followed friends to de altar—it has joined de funeral purcesshun when dese friends war' buried. When men fust see it dey cry out in disgust but, little by little dat grim, relentless specter gits a foothold. It pats you on the back. It walks arm in arm wid you. It becomes a beon companion. De broken voice of a father—de sobs of a mother—de tears of brothers an' sisters do not reach de heart of dis specter. It has no heart—no soul.

"I have heard it laugh as de poo' ole drunkard fell down in de snow to freeze to death.

"I hev heard it exult as de young man was brought home drunk fur de fust time!

"I hev seen it stan' at de cottage window an' dance in glee as de brutal blows of a drunken father smote a sufferin' mother an' innocent chill'en.

"I hev seen it ridiculin' de youth bekase he would not be led into temptashun.

"I look back for twenty years an' ask what has become of Ben an' Tom an' Sam an' a score of others. Dead, alas! How? By old age? No! By accident? No! By disease? No! They locked arms with the specter. Drink, an' drink alone was responsible fur fo' out o' five deaths.

"I look aroun' me to-day an' I see de specter seekin' new victims. It has victims in ebery graveyard in de world—its dead sleep on de mountains and under de sea, but it am not satisfied. It has made a million widows, but its hand is relentless. It has made five millyun orphans, but de number mus' increase.

"De young man who puts liquor in his mouf am holdin' a keen-eged razor to his throat an' walkin' ober broken ground. He am stealing' away an' sellin' to de dramshops his reverence for his father,—his love for mother—his brotherly feelin' fur brothers an' sisters. He am exchangin' honesty industry an' de respeck of his fellow-men fur—what?

"Rum! A specter walkin' beside him wid noiseless step. A serpent lyin' in wait wid deadly fangs. It blights your manhood. It hastens ole age. It digs graves fur heart-broken women and starvin chill'en.

"As I cum down heah to-night I heard wails of sorrow in a house to which de master will neber return. He traded his all for Rum an' de grim specter walked to de riber wid him an coaxed him to jump from de wharf. You cannot imagine how dark de clouds hang ober dese left behind. De victims of dat specter am lyin' about us as if Death had been holdin' a carnival. Walk up and down the streets of any town or city in de land an' your eye will tell you which household welcomes de specter an' which drives him away. What do broken gates, shattered pains, ragged chill'en and bar' floors mean? What de blows, screams, oaths an' arrests mean? What in fo' cases out o' five, cocks de murderer's pistol or draws his deadly knife? What separates husbands an' wives—breaks up homes—fills our asylums and poo' houses?

"It is Rum! Dey talk of de deadly weapons of war, but Rum kills its hundreds whar' war kills its scores. War respects de aiged an' helpless. Rum delights in deir slaughter.

"I say to you, young men, look out fur de fust temptashun. De specter stands behind you to drop pizen in de glass. Men argy wid you dat a glass of beer kin harm no one. Neither kin it benefit anyone. You am simply tradin' off yer money fur sunthin' of no account. It am a step down hill. De man who tells you he kin drink jist so much ebery day an' den let drink alone am baitin' a trap fur hisself to walk into. No vicious habit eber yit stood still on a man. It mus' grow or it mus' be checked.

"You ax a boy 12 years old what drinkin' leads to, an' he will tell you to gamblin', fightin', idleness—de gutter, State Prison, de gallows. If, in de face of dat sartin knowledge, he jines hands wid de specter, who shall argy dat he kin be turned back? Ebery drunkard realizes what de end will be. If he am satisfied why should de world be anxus. I hev no days to devote to de salvashun of sinners who feel deirselves well 'nuff off, nor to de rescue of men who realize dat each glass am another fence-post on de highway to degradashun. I has simply told you how I feel about it. Let us go hum."

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

A new test for tea is the amount of ashes yielded, the quantity being greater in inferior and adulterated samples than in those of good quality.

If paper has been laid under carpet all dust may be easily removed with it. Moreover, greater warmth is secured by using carpet lining, or even old newspapers under carpets.

It is said that mosquitoes, flies, and other pests will not enter a room in which the castor oil plant is growing. It seems that the small boy is not alone in his horror of castor oil.

It was found by exact measurement that a chimney near Marseilles, France, 115 feet high and 4 feet in diameter at the top, reached a maximum oscillation of twenty inches during a high wind.

Prof. N. S Shaler is authority for the statement that 50,000 square miles of territory east of the Mississippi now covered by swamps might easily be drained and turned into fertile lands,

The practice of scalping is not peculiar to the American aborigines. Southall, in his "Recent Origin of Man," quotes from Herodotus to show that the Scythians used to scalp their fallen enemies. In the present time the wild tribes of North-eastern Bengal use the scalping knife.

Voltaire: Nothing is more estimable than a physician who, having studied nature from his youth, knows the properties of the human body, the diseases which assail it, the remedies which will benefit it, exercises his art with caution, and pays equal attention to the rich and poor.

A Paris medical society, seeking evidence from many sources concerning the contagiousness of pulmonary consumption, has forwarded questions on the subject to every practicing physician in France. Similar inquiries in England and in Germany have not been particularly successful, only 1,500 out of 23,000 English practitioners answering, and but 200 Germans out of 16,000.

A new and rather curious application of the steam whistle has been made at the Jacksonville (Ill.) Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. A whistle four feet in length and twelve inches in diameter has been placed on the pinnacle of the boiler house and is used as a signal to awaken the inmates of the institution, etc, who, although they cannot hear, are made sensible of its various signals by the vibration it gives to the buildings.

Vogel, in his "Diseases of Children," tells a story illustrative of the influence of the American mother's milk on the precocity of the infant. He once treated an American mother who still nursed her child, who was then two and a half years old. One morning when called to be nursed this infant politely declined, saying: "No, I thank you, dear mamma, the nursing is too tedious for me." The mother was then convinced that she had better wean the prodigy.

The simplest and least expensive method for removing saltpetre exudation from brick work when the efflorescence is in position where the sun and wind do not have free access is to wash it off with diluted hydrochechloric or common muriatic acid of commerce. About half a pound of the acid is used with an ordinary pailful of water, the application being made with a sponge.

Considering the number of meteoric stones which reach the earth's surface, it would not be surprising if many lives had been destroyed by them. It is stated that loss of life resulted from a large fall in Africa; that about the year 1020 many persons and animals were killed; that in 1511, about 5 o'clock one evening, a priest was struck and killed; and that still later, in 1650, a monk was killed. But these, according to Mr. James R. Gregory, seem to be the only instances recorded of death from falling meteorites.

A German entomologist, F. Dahl, claims that spiders have perfect vision only at a very short distance. Their sense of touch is consequently remarkably well developed, enabling them to locate disturbances in their web. Their smell is so good that they can distinguish odors, and their hearing is excellent. Some of them show a remarkable instinct in building their webs—even their first—in perfect geometrical form. A reflective power is evinced by their refusal of kinds of tough insects which have once been attacked unsuccessfully.

Always in Danger.

A certain Dr. Bull, in New York City, became a confirmed inebriate, and was proved to be so irresponsible that his family succeeded in having guardians appointed to take care of his property. In the course of time Bull applied to the courts to give him back his estate, as he claimed he had overcome his thirst for alcohol. Much interesting testimony was produced as to whether the attraction for strong drink could ever be entirely gotten rid of. It was conceded that there were such persons as reformed drunkards; men who had lived sober lives after having been apparently confirmed sots; but several physicians gave it as their opinion that after a drunkard had an attack of delirium tremens the appetite never really disappeared, though it might not manifest itself if the patient was surrounded by favoring circumstances. The late John B. Gough who had not touched a drop of liquor for over thirty years, said he dared not eat a piece of mince pie away from home, for the brandy or wine it might contain would awaken the dormant demon, the thirst for strong drink, which had made his life as a young man so unhappy. One of the strongest arguments for prohibition is that the absence of a temptation to drink is essential for the protection of the vast army of people who are under the spell which liquor fastens upon its devotees. Young people should be careful how they form the habit, for once acquired one's future life is a constant struggle to resist the appetite then acquired, as the allurements of the gilded saloon are far more effective and numerous than opportunities for healthful recreation.

No Russian lady can travel without her husband's assent to the issue of her passport, but in Austria woman's right to a vote has just been recognized. It is stated that a decree has recently been promulgated to the effect that no married Austrian subject shall hereafter receive a passport for journeying beyond the frontier, without the express consent of his wife.

A WIFE THE WAGER.

A Russian Incident.

"You'd better give up the game for this evening," said a friend of Toheretzoff. The young officer poured out another glass of champagne.

"Retire from the game," he cried, "at the very moment that my luck is returning! I shall not leave the table until daylight."

"I pledge myself to do the same," replied Augustineff.

The game continued with renewed animation. Such struggles have a terrible resemblance to duels to the death. Each adversary watches the other, seeking to divine in his eyes the secret of his next play. Each tries to hide his own thought—he yields, advances, retreats again; eyes flame, hands tremble. A single mistake would be irreparable. Every play is calculated, all consequences are reckoned, and cards are rapidly flung down in order to disconcert the adversary. Finally one of the two becomes confused; he feels his luck departing from him; he staggers; he succumbs. It's all over with him; the game is lost!

Thus in that memorable night succumbed Toheretzoff. Long before the dawn began to glimmer, and the nights in St. Petersburg are long, he had lost all that he possessed—his house upon the grand Moskala, his fine estates in the central provinces, and even his beautiful chateau in the Ukraine, where he used to raise the finest horses in the empire and lived like a king when he went hither with his young wife to visit his serfs and receive the revenue of his lands.

But what gambler ever believes he has lost, so long as there yet remains to him anything to lose? Toheretzoff could not stake the diamonds of the princess, and he had already pledged all his own—even the diamonds of his decorations and a fine jewel he were upon his finger—a rich gift from the Czar.

He rose up all dazed, took a glass, filled and emptied it several times in succession—walked thrice around the room, and returned to take his place before Augustineff, who sat there quietly shuffling the cards as if waiting for another adversary to continue the game.

But when he saw Toheretzoff again in front of him, Augustinoff arose in turn.

"It is not yet day," said Toheretzoff—"why do you get up?"

"You cannot play any more; you have lost everything!"

"How do you know?"

"Have you some hidden treasure?"

"Yes, I have hidden treasures."

And continuing in a whisper, a strangled whisper that barely escaped from his livid lips, he said:

"You love my wife."

"Who told you so?"

"Nobody; I know it! I have not now even the means of nourishing her. I will play you for her. I will stake her against all that you won from me this evening."

A flash as of lightning flamed and passed in the eyes of Augustineff, and for the first time his handsome and passionless gambler's face evinced the emotion of his soul.

"I accept," he said.

But his voice now trembled like that of his adversary. Emotion choked the words at his throat, and came forth only with difficulty.

He continued.

"Still, I accept only under two conditions. The first is this: My stake is insufficient. I add to it 500,000 rubles, because I cannot add any more. Secondly, you must have the divorce obtained, taking upon yourself all responsibility for it. The reputation of the princess is without spot; she must not be touched by so much as the breath of an evil whisper."

"I accept the conditions," replied Toheretzoff. "The first is flattering to my wife; the second is flattering to myself. It shall not exceed my generosity."

At the moment of taking up the cards Augustineff was seized with a singular nervousness. He seemed afraid to begin a contest of which the woman he loved was the stake. Was he afraid of losing? Or did he fear a disdainful rejection by the princess of the terms to which she had unconsciously been made a part—a contemptuous refusal that would annihilate the fruits of victory in his very grasp? All these feelings blended in the tumult of his mind and robbed him of much of that wonderful coolness he had always shown in ordinary playing.

The game commenced. It then assumed the aspect of a mortal duel, indeed.

A deep silence reigned in the hall. Each held his breath, and nothing could be heard except the dry sound of the cards falling upon one another, like the soldiers mortally wounded. From time to time a voice spoke, announcing a point made—then the gliding of the counters marking it. At each play the two adversaries paused, like wrestlers overcome with fatigue and trembling at the thought of defeat. The chances seemed equal, the skill evenly proportionate. A bold but incautious play was finally made by Toheretzoff. It might in other cases have brought victory—it only led to defeat!

Then, for the first time, the man whom the fever had possessed for ten long years suddenly assumed an attitude full of noble dignity. He bowed to Augustineff, saluted him as officers salute each other under arms, and said:

"I shall keep my word."

It never so much as occurred to him to question the validity of his engagement. But from the pallor of his face, the mist in his eyes, the lines of pain about his mouth and forehead, it was easy to see how terrible the self-restraint and how violent the agony within.

The pledge was faithfully fulfilled. Toheretzoff obtained the divorce, taking upon himself all the responsibility of the act and assuming all the faults. Certainly the most serious fault was that of having staked his wife upon a game of cards. In Russia the position of a divorced husband is very serious. He is not merely liable to a heavy penalty, but even to deprivation of liberty. The Czar's favorite aid-de-camp was not imprisoned, but he was permitted as a very special favor to join the forces at war in the Caucasus. He departed, but never returned.

And you ask what was the fate of the princess and what free choice did she make?

Well, it is evident that she must have acquiesced in the consequences of her husband's losses, inasmuch as she became princess Augustineff.

WHAT WOMEN ARE DOING.

Thirteen years ago only three girls were employed in the Lambeth potteries of Messrs. Doulton; now there are three hundred.

The Virginia Lancet, of Petersburg, Va., is said to be the only paper in this country conducted by a colored woman. Its editor is Carrie Bragg.

The French national printing office employs girls as type-founders, printers, bookbinders, sewers, bookbinders, etc., the wages ranging from fifty cents to one dollar per day. After thirty years' service both men and women are retired upon a pension.

Miss Mary Anderson, who recently returned to the city of Louisville, in which she spent her early years, was honored by a special vote of congratulation, passed by the Kentucky State Legislature, and presented to her on the stage in the presence of the audience.

A interesting bill before the Sterling (Ill.) one to grant a married woman the control of her own property, which has hitherto been entirely at the disposal of the husband. This is one of the many steps being taken in Norway to improve the condition of woman.

Miss Augusta Holmes has nearly finished the opera she is composing on an Irish theme. An antique legend of Erin is the subject chosen by the lady, who has composed her own librette. Miss Holmes spent the autumn in London, studying the ancient Irish M.S.S. in the British Museum.

Mme. Ribard, of Paris, leaves Paris for Tonquin, being appointed family physician to the family of M Paul Bert, the new governer general of that French colony. Mme. Ribard is also intrusted with the organization of an ophthalmic and vaccine establishment at Tonquin. She is an oculist by profession.

The Lancet says that a maiden lady named Heathorn, who is known as the "Maid of Kent," has just completed her 103d year, having been baptized at Tenterden in April, 1783. The venerable lady possesses all her faculties, and is reported to have indorsed a check without the aid of glasses on her birthday, which occurred last month.

The U. S. Ladies' Health Protective Association has induced the owners of slaughter-houses to make the improvements recommended by the ladies. These consist of putting in asphalt floors, having the buildings for slaughtered meat kept away from the street of the sidewalk, keeping the avenues clear for trucks, and keeping the houses shut up so that the children in the neighborhood may not see the cattle slaughtered.

We have before now had occasion to speak of the excellence of the work accomplished in Paris by the ladies forming the Society of the Liberees de St. Lazare, the great female prison. It is well known to the depths of misery the women prisoners in St. Lazare were reduced before Mlle. de Grandpre began her beneficent work. The work of assisting the discharged prisoners has now been carried on since 1870 with continuously increasing success. During the past year three departments of work have been organized; the first is that of the ladies or nuns who receive the women on their release from prison at 28 Place Denfert, distributing clothing or rations of food to them, and endeavor to procure employment for them. The second branch is the Bicêtre court Asylum, where the children of the prisoners are taken care of during their term of punishment. The third branch is that of the lady visitors, who last year obtained permission to enter the prison and visit the women there. They can thus learn their wishes, ascertain what work they are capable of, and obtain employment ready for them at their discharge.

New Gold Fields.

Since the exhaustion of the placer mines of California and Australia there has been a large falling off in the production of gold. At one time some $200,000,000 was the product of the mines in one year. Last year the production of the whole world was not much over $70,000,000. This is particularly unfortunate in view of the fact that gold is now the sole measure of value, and its scarcity means lower and still lower prices, thus throwing a cloud on the business interests of the world. There is reason to believe, however, that in a few years there will be new supplies of gold from different parts of the earth. Patagonia promises to be a most important gold field. The deposit extends from Cape Virgin, on the northern shore of the Straits of Magellan, along the Atlantic shore some fifty miles. The gold country is easily accessible, and the deposits are known to be as rich as those of California or Australia. Further supplies of gold also are expected from South Africa. There is a gold fever in the Transvaal. On the closing week of last year 560 ounces of gold were received at Natal. Farther north rich deposits of gold and other metals have been found south of the Limpopo. This region is but little known to white men, but if it is as rich as reported tens of thousands of white miners will soon be in Central Africa. Northern Thibet is another region which is known to contain vast quantities of gold, which will very soon be extensively worked. It is an upland region with underlying rock, and there is from sixteen to twenty feet of soil, all of which is auriferous. Then there is gold in abundance in Manthuria. This is a region of China near the Russian possessions. Madagascar reports come of wonderful finds. In Burmah, also, which has recently been annexed by Great Britain, there are believed to be valuable gold regions. Should the United States has maintained the lead in producing gold. But should gold be found in Patagonia, Southern and Central Africa, in Burmah, Thibet, and Northern China, it will lead to the emigration of white people to those distant regions. Should any large quantity of gold be found it would greatly stimulate the commerce of the world. Not only would business be benefited but civilization would gain by a rush to these different auriferous regions.

Mrs. Emily Fifield has been chosen a member of the Boston School Committee. She is the wife of Dr. W. C. B. Fifield, for the Dorchester District, has served several years on the School Committee, and is well qualified for the position.

Rest.

My feet are wearied and my hands are tired,
My soul oppressed—
And I desire what I have long desired—
Rest—only rest.

Hard to toil, when toil is almost va'n,
In barren ways;
Hard to sow and never garner grain,
In harvest days.

The burden of my days is hard to bear,
But God knows best;
And I have prayed, but vain has been my prayer,
For rest—sweet rest.

Hard to plant in spring and never reap
The autumn yield;
Hard to till, and when 'tis tilled to weep
O'er fruitless field.

So I cry a weak and human cry,
So heart oppressed;
So I sigh a weak and human sigh,
For rest—for rest.

My way has wound across the desert years,
And cares infest
The path, and through the flowing of hot tears
I pine for rest.

And I am restless still; 'twill soon be o'er;
For crown the west
The sun is setting, and I see the shore
Where I shall rest.

MY NEW FRIEND.

CHAPTER II.

Acting upon our friend's advice, and somewhat perhaps by his energy, we told the maid to ask the applicant into the room in which we were seated, which, bad as it was, was by far the most presentable part of the house. The stranger was heard descending the stairs slowly, and apparently with caution; then he presented himself at the open door, and, in obedience to my invitation, entered and took a seat. He looked round timidly upon us, and then, fixing a large tortoise eyeglass upon his nose, looked again. He was a stout man, apparently about sixty years of age, for his hair was gray, his whiskers quite white, and though at one time he must have been of powerful frame, he was now evidently somewhat feeble, as we could judge by the manner in which he seated himself and groaned slightly as he did so.

"I am sorry to intrude upon you at this hour of the evening, madam," he began; "but I noticed the bill in your window a few days ago, when I was in this neighborhood. I must reside somewhere in this vicinity, and should have called earlier; but I was not quite certain that, an old friend could not accommodate me. I find now that he can do so, so have ventured to trouble you at this unusual hour."

"Ah! I am afraid, sir, that an unfortunate change has put it out of my power to offer you suitable apartments," I replied. "To be frank, sir, I have now not enough furniture for myself, instead of being able to spare any for my lodgers. While I had been speaking, the old gentleman had dropped his eyeglass, and now, ere replying, he looked about for it in a helpless way, which would have been laughable if it had not been somewhat pitiful too. Adjusting it to his eyes again, he looked at us for a moment, then said: "I don't want furnished apartments. I ought to have explained that at first. I have not long come home from abroad; and my only daughter, with whom I have been staying, has now gone to Australia with her husband; leaving me a little furniture, in case I like to keep on the house. But I don't like it; it won't suit me at all. I want a quiet lodging with a small family, where I can furnish my two rooms; taking my meals by myself, or with the family, as I please. I am a quiet person, I think, rather an invalid, but no trouble; and I am willing to pay you rent for my rooms, and thirty shillings a week for my board." His eyeglass tumbled down once more, and while he was fumbling for it we did not seem able to do anything without it—Scate nudged me with his elbow, and gave a knowing wink,—"I thought it best to explain that I cannot afford very high terms, madam," continued the old gentleman, addressing my wife, "in order to save discussion. I have made a note of two other addresses which may suit, but should prefer to close without further trouble, as, being an invalid, I do not care about much worry. There is my card." He handed to Mr. Scate, who sat nearest to him, a card, from which the latter read aloud, "Mr. Daniel Chelps," and then passed it to me.

"Mr. Chelps," exclaimed Scate, as if struck with a sudden thought, "allow me to offer you some refreshment." Mr. Chelps turning his head a little towards him, said: "Will you please to speak a little louder, sir? I am unfortunately a little hard of hearing."

Scate loudly repeated his invitation; it was easier for him to speak loudly than in subdued key.

"No, sir—no, sir?" returned the other with a sad smile. "You have brandy there, I think, and the doctors won't allow me to touch anything but sherry;"

"Then, it's just the thing!" cried Scate; "for this is sherry, and the best you'll find within five miles from this place, I'll bet." The old gentleman sipped the wine, smacked his lips approvingly, and said: "And now, sir, we will proceed to business.—I do not see, madam, that the misfortune to which Mr. Matley referred need make any difference in my plans. I am an old man, as you see, and merely want to be comfortable. I want, as I have said, to live where I can either mix with the family, or shut myself up in my own room, just as I please. I shall give no trouble; and though I cannot afford more than I said, my money is safe. I want to settle my plans to night; and I must honestly own, that from some reliable information which I obtained in my first inquiries, a week or so back, I should prefer to come here to anywhere else I have heard of, believing I should be more comfortable.

Finding him still willing to go on with the negotiations, I at once declared my anxiety to obtain a tenant, and although he asked a few questions, Mr Chelps made no difficulties, and it was arranged that he should take up his quarters with us on the following day. The effect of the sherry upon him was to open out his heart; for he grew so loquacious and discursive, that with very little encouragement he would have told us all about his married daughter who had gone to Australia; about the late Mrs, Chelps, on whose worth he dilated, and to whose memory he wiped his eyes; and would, I believe, have furnished us with complete biographies of every relative he had ever possessed. We got rid of him chiefly through the tact of Mr. Scate, who declared he was going to the street through which ran the omnibus the old gentleman wished to catch, and he offered his company, which the other very eagerly accepted.

Mr. Chelps having no friends in the vicinity whom he cared about troubling in the matter, gave us the name of a firm somewhere down by the Docks as referees. I say "somewhere down;" for I did not take the trouble, as I ought to have done, of going there to make the proper inquiries. He had done business with them, he said; and they had known him, at home and abroad, for years. He insisted on paying a deposit; and while he was settling this with my wife, and she was writing down the address of his reference, which was rather a tedious affair, as Mr. Chelp's memory for names and addresses did not appear to be very good, Mr. Scate seized the opportunity of saying a few words in an undertone to me.

"This is a lift!" he said. "You have let your place, and let it well, too, I consider, to an old fellow with no wife or relative to bother you or give trouble. Didn't I tell you your luck would turn?—and here it's turning like the tide. Tell your good little wife to keep up her spirits. I shall be round to morrow night, and I expect to see my friends between this and then. I am sure to have something to tell you; and while you are waiting, if a five-pound note is of any service to you, it is ready at a moment's notice.—Coming, sir!—quite ready." This was in answer to Mr. Chelp's; and then the two left the room and the house together; Mr. Scate turning at the last moment to favor us with a grin full of meaning.

It may be guessed that Susan and I sat up for some little time talking over the strange and unexpected events of the night; of our good fortune in securing such a lodger; and what a good thing, too, it was that he had not come a few days earlier, when he would have been subject to all the annoyance and turmoil of the sale. We could manage now, poor Susan thought, especially if I could contrive to obtain some employment, which I seemed likely to do through the disinterested kindness of Mr. Scate. This latter recollection of course started another subject of conversation, and we could hardly say enough in praise of him. Yet it was plain we had each a secret but very real dislike to the man, which we sought to smother by continual laudation of him. It would have been ungrateful in the highest degree to utter a word which could reflect anything but praise of him—so we did not say it; but we found out that each thought unfavorably of him all the same.

Well, the morning came; and punctually at the time he had named, came Mr. Chelps also, closely followed by a small van-load of furniture. We were pleased to see that this furniture was all in good condition; was, in fact, almost or quite new, so bright and shining was everything. He explained, on our remarking upon this, that his married daughter who had gone to Australia, had furnished some rooms entirely for him, just before she knew she was going, and that her departure was very sudden. He was as chatty as before, having a nice sympathizing way, which won very much upon Susan, who was greatly taken with him.

The deposit he had left in my wife's hands had enabled us to purchase one or two necessities, and even luxuries; and in the evening Mr. Chelps joined us at tea, and was so cheerful in his conversation, and so full of queer little anecdotes, that he quite led us away from our own troubles, until he brought them back by asking, but in a very nice way too, what I thought of doing in the future. I told him that so far as my own resources and influence were concerned, I had little prospect of doing any good, but that a friend—an entirely new friend, indeed—Mr. Scate, the gentleman whom he had seen on the previous evening, had most generously, most unexpectedly come forward, and had almost obtained the promise of a situation for me. As in duty bound, Susan and I broke into praise of Mr. Scate, and told how he had been an entire stranger, and how he was the only one who had anything like a friendly feeling towards us.

While I was talking, and while Susan was talking, Mr. Chelps listened with great intentness; but it was difficult to avoid a smile when I saw him put up his double eyeglass, as though he listened with it; and then, when it fell off, as it was continually doing, the helpless way in which he would grope about for it, was more comical still. We raised our voices at first when speaking to him; but he told us there was no occasion for this with us, as, when persons spoke clearly and distinctly, he could hear them much better than he could those who bawled at him. He was very much interested in our account of Mr. Scate, in whom he declared he had taken an interest at first sight.

Very soon after this, the latter's loud knock was heard; and then Mr. Scate was immediately shown in. Mr. Chelps rose as he entered, and after a very friendly bow to the visitor, said to us: "I shall be down again in a few minutes, Mr. Matley, when, if you will allow me, I will sit for half-an-hour and have a chat with Mr. Scate and yourselves." Of course we all said we should be much pleased if he would join us, Mr. Scate probably being the most emphatic of the three; and the old gentleman toddled slowly up-stairs.

Scate listened to his retreating footsteps with a knowing look, until he was satisfied Mr. Chelps was out of hearing; then turning to us with the grin and wink so customary with him, said; "You've got the old boy all right then?—You will always recollect, Mrs. Matley, that I said at the first moment 'he would do.'" My wife assured him she should always remember this; and then Mr. Scate proposed that we should sit down and talk business.

He at once said he had seen the friends from whom he hoped so much, and that they were quite willing to engage me, so that I might expect to hear from them in a few days. If I did join them, I should find it somewhat better than drudging on in a miserable office as clerk. His friends did not go in much for clerks—no, no; that was not their game. On hearing this, I naturally inquired in what "their game," as he styled it, consisted; but although he launched out into copious praise of their liberality, and admiration of their extensive transactions, I could not understand what kind of business they carried on, or what particular situation I was likely to fill. Yet he kept on talking about the firm, and congratulating me upon my good fortune in securing a position with them, and glancing at the confidence they reposed in him, as shown by their accepting a stranger on his recommendation, until I heard Mr. Chelps's slow lumbering step approaching.

I called his attention to this, and said that we perhaps had better go up stairs into the parlor, dismantled as it was, for a short time, in order that we might for a few minutes more speak uninterruptedly. Scate reflected for an instant, then exclaimed; "O no. Never mind the old fellow! I shan't say anything that I don't want him to hear. I shan't let him know too much, believe me. Besides, he is rather good fun, and I like to watch him.—Hush! here he is. Ha! Mr. Chelps," he cried, with an assumption of the heartiest goodfellowship, as the old gentleman entered the room, "how are you now?"

Mr. Chelps, as he came in, answered the salutation frankly; and then Mr. Scate proceeded to repeat the information he had just given to us. While Mr. Scate was telling all this to Mr. Chelps, my wife left us, to superintend Lizzie in her domestic operations.

Mr. Chelp's mind still ran on my affairs; and as the evening wore on, he plied Mr. Scate with very direct questions, such as I much wished to ask, but lacked the courage to do. Mr. Scate was at first as vague with him as he had been with me; but under the pressure of the old gentleman's repeated inquiries, he eventually explained that his friends were "general agent and miscellaneous merchants," who bought and sold all kinds of goods for all markets, home and foreign. Anything, anywhere, they would buy it if it were cheap and saleable; and would sell at smallest profit to do business quickly. That, their business being rather peculiar, they preferred to conduct it by agents on whom they could rely—"Such as our friend here, Mr. Matley," he said—"to having a central office, as other merchants did. They always bought for ready-money, which gave them a command of the market, so far as needy venders were concerned, so that they could often obtain goods at much less than the cost of production. This applied as much to foreign manufacturers as to English. When they gave short bills to foreigners, they would always discount them themselves if required. They reckoned on a dividend of forty per cent. every year."

The eyes of Mr. Chelps twinkled and glistened more than ever as he listened to this, until finally he said, that the idea seemed so good, so feasable, and so profitable, that having a great deal of time on his hands, and some spare capital by him, he was more than half inclined to set foot on something of the kind himself. At this Mr. Scate's eyes twinkled and glistened even more than those of the old gentleman, and he said that, with his influence, it was not impossible but that Mr. Chelps might be admitted to take a small share in this very business. "A most difficult thing to be done, I assure you," said he; "for they won't look at outsiders as a rule—turn away thousands after thousands every year, that people are almost going down on their knees and asking them to take. Yet, with my recommendation, perhaps—But how much could you invest?" he said abruptly.

"Not a great deal—not more than eleven or twelve hundred pounds, which, by-the-by, is already invested," returned Chelps, who seemed by his tone to admit the contemptible smallness of the sum he spoke of. "All the rest is in houses, with a few ground-rents."

"Well, never mind; I will see what I can do about it," returned Scate. "When can you get at your money? I ask, because I know they are making a lot of purchases, so now will be the time."

"As soon as you please after the first of next month," replied Chelps.—"That is not very far off.—What name did you say your firm's was?"

It was certain that Mr. Scate had not mentioned any name; and he advised the old gentleman not to go any further with his inquiries at present, until he knew whether there would be any chance of his money being used. But Chelps by this time was in no mood to be put off or evaded, and he determined to have their names, if only to wish success to the venture.

"Bunner, Wreggs, and Carrowble, that's them," said Mr. Scate at last; and then he went on to explain that the time named by Mr. Chelps was the most auspicious he could possibly have chosen for his money to be accepted, and this being the case, he would not lose a day in breaking the matter to his firm.

This so delighted Mr. Chelps, that he insisted upon having a friendly glass of something hot, which was immediately sent for, and actually proposed to sing a song, on condition that Mr. Scate would help in the chorus. This the latter unhesitatingly promised to do; and Mr. Chelps began "My Pretty Jane," and sang it through, while Mr. Scate repeated the last part of each verse in conjunction with him, as a chorus! Anything more awful in the way of singing I never heard; I should think nothing more awful ever was heard. Then, after a little more discussion of business matters, Mr. Scate left, with many a shake of the hand from Mr. Chelps, and protestations of the warmest friendship on both sides.

I think I have said that Mr. Chelp's conversation was on this evening more than usually cheerful and interesting; but directly Mr. Scate had left, he seemed to fall back into his natural manner. Noticing this, I did not find my liking for Mr. Scate increased; in fact, it was as much as I could do to avoid thoroughly disrelishing him, in spite of the benefit he was conferring upon me and the trouble he was taking in my behalf.

Markdale Standard

VOL. 6.--No. 300. MARKDALE, ONT., JUNE 10, 1886. COPIES OF THE STANDARD FIVE CENTS EACH.

Local and Other Items.

Notices in these columns intended to benefit individual or Society will be charged ten cents a line for the first insertion and five cents a line each subsequent insertion.

The county court is in session this week.

Mr. W. L. B. Hamlin of Maxwell is in town this week.

Mrs. E. S. Mabee is visiting friends at Belwood and Fergus.

Mr. Sproule, M. P., returned home from Ottawa last Friday.

Two car loads of potatoes wanted at once at J. R. Trimble's.

Work is steadily progressing on the new dwelling houses of Mr. G. S. Lewis.

Mr. Samuel Walker, formerly of this place, is now here on a visit from Chatham.

A very few excursionists left here to attend the regatta at Toronto on Friday and Saturday last.

Messrs. Geo, Grant & W. L. Young have dissolved partnership. See their notice in another column.

The Irish Lake pic-nic will be held on Wednesday the 23rd inst. It promises to be a grand success.

Mr. Jas. Stewart and H. Hulbert of Artemesia captured a young bear while near Eugenia recently.

The High School entrance examination will be held in Durham on the 7th and 8th days of July.

We deeply regret to learn that Jas. Soule, who is lying ill at Chesley, is still in a very critical condition.

Quite a number from this place attended the South Grey conservative convention in Durham on Tuesday.

Our Lamb has been talking of fleecing the new editor. We don't see why he did not say anything about him in his last issue.

Thos. H. Newen, from all over the continent, struck Markdale yesterday. Tom is every body's friend, and all are glad to meet him.

No service in the Presbyterian church on Sabbath last, Rev. Mr. Casson having to dispense the sacrament in Flesherton.

Mr. A. McPherson, of Forest, Ont., formerly manager of Lucas & Co's bank, Flesherton, was in town last week, also Mr. E. G. Lucas, of Dunkirk.

Roger's Peerless Oil is recommended highly for all kinds of machinery. Farmers should use it on their reapers, mowers and threshing machines.

There will be a monster meeting of Reformers in Owen Sound on the 16th inst, when the Hon. Edward Blake and other leading politicians will be present.

Mr. Thos. McNeil is having his two stores on Mill St. re-painted, and improves appearance considerably. He is also pushing towards completion his new Sash & Door Factory.

The Flesherton Advance entered last week upon its sixth year, with, we are pleased to note, strong indications of continued prosperity. We have our very best wishes brother Sweett.

The attention of our readers is hereby drawn to the notice in another column, of the final sitting re voters lists for Artemesia and Glenelg, to be held in Flesherton and Markdale respectively.

Tenders will be received for the erection of a dwelling house on a vacant lot in rear of Revere Hotel, Markdale, up to July the 20th. Plans and specifications can be seen by applying to the undersigned. The lowest or any tender not necessarily accepted. Samuel Blaney, Markdale.

A goodly number of the young folks attended the pic-nic at Eugenia last Tuesday, and returned home in the evening feeling tired after perambulating all day through the woods and among the rocks.

The Garden Party on Friday evening. promises to be something more than ordinary. The ground of Mr. Wm. Armstrong are well adapted for such. The ice-cream, and lemonade will be of the first quality.

Mr. R W Ennis preached a very interesting sermon in the Methodist church last Sabbath morning,and Mr. Geo. Steer in the evening, in the absence of the parson, Rev. Mr. Casson, who has been attending Conference.

Mr. Alex. Lucas called on his brother Monday on his way home from Calgary, having safely delivered fifteen car loads of Ontario heifers by the first through train on the C. P. R. He intends moving his family there in August.

Who is to carry away the debris caused by the removal of the old church? If the person who took the old church away, why has he not done so? If not, why not employ some person to do so? It is an eye sore to the public.

The sidewalk between the English Church and the schoolhouse is in such a delapidated condition, as to endanger the lives of the pupils on their way to and from school. Which of us would like to have one of our children carried home to us dead or with a broken limb? Is it not high time the Trustees were at work?

Robbed by a Mink.—Last week one of our quite and industrious citizens was out fishing, and when starting for home with a large string of the "speckled beauties", unthinkingly he placed his fish in the water, and on turning round to pick up, found them gone. Billy is determined to beware of sharpers in the future when out fishing.

Garden Party.—The Young People's Society of the Methodist church will give a Garden Party to-morrow (Friday) evening on the grounds of Wm. Armstrong, Esq. The Brass Band will be present and discourse melodious music during the event. Admission 15 cents. proceeds to be expended on the erection of a new fence around the Methodist church grounds. All are cordially invited to attend.

Park House, Goderich, is a hotel especially adapted for the comfort and convenience of tourists, being situated at the west end, adjoining the large pleasure grounds from which a splendid view of the lake can be had. We spent a week at this hotel together with 40 other delegates to conference, all of whom were so pleased with the treatment received, that they passed a unanimous resolution of thanks to Mr. Doyle, proprietor, for his attention and hospitality.

Serious Accident.—We regret to have to report a serious accident which befel Rev. Mr. Ward last week, while driving near Hogg's mill Artemesia, where the road curved round a hill and was very narrow, the horse took fright at a pile of lumber on the road and bolted down a steep bank capsizing the buggy and pitching Mr. W. violently among stones and stumps rendering him unconscious in which state he remained about an hour; with a great effort he reached Mr. Talbert's, about a mile distant; Mr. T drove him home the same evening, and altho' no bones were broken, he received many bad bruises,

The left eye was completely closed, and left side of head is badly bruised and an ugly cut from which the blood saturated his clothes and the ground where he had been lying. He is still in a critical condition, and the doctors say it will be weeks before he will be able to resume active duties. The horse was none the worse, but the buggy completely smashed.

DANGER AHEAD.

There is danger ahead from neglected colds. A tight cough and irritated throat are the warning signs of lurking danger to the lungs. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam cures colds, sore throats, stubborn coughs, and all bronchial and lung troubles.

The coming event of this summer is the performance of Queen Esther at Flesherton on the 1st of July. Part of it will be in the open air and free to the public, and the concert and drama, which will take two hours to render it completely, will be performed in the drill shed, in which a stage will be erected to accommodate one hundred performers. The drill shed is the largest in the county, being two bents larger than the Government specifications, and will accommodate a fine audience. All who are provided with tickets will be accommodated, an early application will be advisable as only a limited number of tickets will be sold equal to the seating capacity of the hall. A 10 or 15 cent lunch will be provided for all requiring it. For stabling for horses, and billets for visitors staying over night, apply at office of Committee. Flesherton has only one hotel, but the whole village will be an hotel on this occasion in order to make the visitors who come from a distance comfortable and welcome; there will be a large crowd, but their comfort will be looked after. The reports of correspondents show that in most of the fall wheat districts of the Province the winter weather was very unfavorable to the crop. Heavy rains carried off the snow over wide acres, leaving fields exposed to intense cold in January and February; sheets of ice lay in hollows and on low ground during the latter month; and alternate freezing and thawing prevailed throughout March. "Killed," "smothered," and "heaved out" express the tenor of a great many reports and in portions of the country from ten to seventy per cent. of the wheat land has been ploughed up or re-sown with other grain. In a few sections there are complaints of too much spring rain, and in others the unthrifty appearance of many fields is attributed to the lack of rain. Of the six Lake Erie countries, where nearly a quarter of the fall wheat acreage, of the Province lies, Welland is the only one which promises a full crop, while the adjoining country of Haldimand is likely to be much short of an average. Excepting in the southern part of Lambton, the crops on Lake Huron countries wintered well, and its present condition is very satisfactory. In Grey and Simcoe, on the Georgian Bay, the prospects is not cheering, and the acreage has been reduced to a considerable extent. The West Midland countries gives varying reports—those for Middlesex, Oxford and Brant being the least favorable. Dufferin promises well, and in Perth the lookout is almost invariably pronounced very good. Over the country from Wellington to Durham, and between Lake Ontario and Georgian Bay, serious injury was caused by ice lying on the fields in winter, and the crops were very uneven. In York and Simcoe countries especially ice and exposure proved to be very destructive to the wheat plant, and a large breadth has been ploughed up. Lincoln and Northumberland alone, of the Lake Ontario countries, give promise of a good harvest. In the East Midland countries the crops is variable, and in the St. Lawrence and Ottawa group it wintered safely and makes a fine show, excepting where some bad effects were left by ice and snow in part of Grenville, Carleton and Lanark. The fine growing weather with which the country has been favored since the middle of April has greatly improved the prospect of the crop, and a smaller area has been ploughed up in consequence than seemed at all probable when the snow disappeared. The indications are, however, that without unusually favorable or unfavorable weather from now until harvest the yield will fall nearly a fifth short of the average of the past four years.

The report on clover are on the whole favorable, and the crop is at least two weeks earlier than last year. Clover of last year's seeding has suffered little, either by winter or spring weather; but the clover on old meadows has been extensively injured especially on undrained, low-laying or heavy soils, by ice and frost heaving.

Ploughing for spring crops commence from two to three weeks earlier than last year's and seeding proportionatelyearly; but in some districts the work was delayed by wet weather, especially on heavy clay and undrained lands in the lake shore counties from Norfolk to Peel. In the northern and eastern counties the green appears of crops presents a strike and favorable contrast to their backward state last spring's wheat, oats and peas are very cheering. Apparently, however, the breadth of spring wheat is less than last year, while that of peas and barley is great.

The reports on live stock are generally favorable. Fodder was abundant every where unless in portions of Simcoe and Muskoka, and almost the only complaint made is that cattle did not feed owing to the changeable character of the winter. Hogs and sheep have been reduced in number since last year, but the spring weather has been very favorable for the rearing of pigs and lambs, which are reported as numerous. Animals of all classes were turned on grass about three weeks earlier than usual, and old and young are in hearty condition.

THE FARM.

When to Cut Wheat and Grass.

The time is approaching, when the question of the proper time to reap and mow will again begin to interest the farming world. Too many things affect the ability of the farmer to reap his grain and mow his grass exactly at the proper theoretical time for doing this work to make it worth while to lay down a positive rule. Yet ignorance of the subject and general carelessness often cause mistakes to be made which do great injury to the quality of the crop.

In the matter of timothy the time of cutting varies very considerably with different farmers. Some cut when the bloom is first on, some when the bloom is going off, some wait till the seed is fully formed and begins to harden. Many do not finish cutting till the seed shatter badly. Evidently the extremes to avoid are: Cutting when the grass is so green that in curing it will dry up and lose weight excessively, and waiting till the stalk has largely turned to woody fiber. There is very little question that a leaning to the former is better than to the latter. If the crop could be cut all at once the ideal time would be when the bloom is just off. If the crop to be cut will take some days, begin before this time. It is not good policy to attempt to make of grass both a hay crop and a grain crop. If, therefore, the grass stands long enough to mature the seed sufficiently for it to form an important element of food the gain will be more than offset by the rapid conversion of digestible matter in the stalk to woody fibre. The digestibility of the hay being the most important factor in the question of hay-making, this point should be kept constantly in mind.

As to reaping wheat when the grain alone is considered, there can be little doubt that the proper time to cut wheat is when the grain is ripe, not hard and flinty, but fully rounded and growing hard. The old saying that wheat should be cut when "in the dough" is too unreliable to do duty as a rule to go by. When the heads are golden, but before the stalks begin to bend over and here and there let a head drop as if with a broken neck, is the best time to reap wheat. But it is better to be cut after this than before. With the approved appliances of the present day, when grain may be cut with so little handling and consequent shelling, the crop may be permitted to grow riper than in old times.

Cutting too green is a heavy loss. The writer remembers observing, a year or two ago on a certain wheat farm, the great difference in yield and quality of the wheat cut too green and that allowed to stand, or rather which was last reached in the order of harvesting. The portion of the crop cut the first few days of harvest showed a depreciation of fully 25 per cent. from that cut in a similar length of time at the end of harvest.

Timely Suggestions.

We suggest that an acre or two of good land, located convenient to the hog pasture, be planted in some early maturing variety of sweet corn, to be fed off during the first half of September as a prelude to beginning on the main crop. If an occasional hill be planted in pumpkins these will have an extra opportunity for growth; or, if preferred, turnips may be sown in the corn about the 1st of August, and if the soil be good and the season favorable a good yield may be expected.

It is said that sheep may be effectually marked with dry Venetian red by simply taking a pinch of the dry powder and drawing the thumb and finger through the wool at the spot you wish to mark, loosening the powder as you do so. It will combine with the oil in the wool and make a bright red mark that the rains will never wash out, and which, without injuring the wool, will endure from one shearing to another, while it can be readily cleansed out by the manufacturer.

Fed to pigs, skim milk and buttermilk are worth one-fourth as much as cornmeal. Fed to calves, they are worth, on an average, 25 cents per 100. Warm to 98 degrees for feeding, feed three times a day, and feed sweet. As the calf grows add oatmeal gruel, and finally clear oatmeal. The skim milk of one good cow and $2 worth of oatmeal will raise two calves through the season—spring and fall.

While not believing much in dosing any farm animals or even human beings, there can be no doubt that occasional doses of turpentine, sulphur, and charcoal, mixed with their feed, help to keep pigs in good condition. If these are given once a week the hog cholera will not appear.

Kerosene oil will take rust from iron if time enough is given; but for quick work a few drops of sulphuric acid rubbed on the rust is preferable. But the iron must be well scoured and a little oil poured on as soon as the rust is removed. The acid will eat into the iron and form more rust unless this precaution is attended to.

Burdette on the Boycott.

One day a Boycott strolled into the toolhouse and sat down for a chat. The hammer and a saw, a pegging awl and a trowel and other honest tools took advantage of the entrance of a boy looking for something he had no business to take, to move a little further away. "Why do you avoid me? asked the Boycott. "Am I not a friend of labor? Am I not its mightiest weapon? Am I not your common defender?" "Excuse us," replied an old sledge, who was seven up in the civil service lists, "but you don't seem to be one of us. There is a smell of Russian prison about you, a stiffling taint of German oppression, a stench of English repression, and a foul odor of Hungarian pauperism, a general decayed flavor of ignorance and brutality, and a senseless ferocity that we don't like. We know it isn't your fault; it was born of tyranny and helplessness, but it isn't American, and it isn't pleasant. You have a foreign air about you that makes the room close and offensive. Go out and wade around and hunt for the Oregon fer about six months, and you'll come back as clean as a Chinaman. Go soak yourself, boycott yourself, and see how glad we'll be to welcome you into the shop." This fable teaches us to remember that no civilized Christian man ever yet learned to threw the boomerang with danger to his enemy or safety to himself.

ATTACKED BY VAMPIRE BATS.

An Experience in Borneo.

Some years ago, Capt. O. H. Rogers, of the ship Phœbus, with a small party of gentlemen, was ascending the Limbang River, in Borneo. They came to the place where it receives the waters of the Madihit, a small current flowing in an easterly direction. Nominally, the party was out on an exploring expedition, but it is safe to say that the love of adventure brought them thither more than the interests of science.

While travelling onward, and quietly on the watch for deer, they discerned something lying on the ground not far off, above which hovered a swarm of what they supposed to be insects. Their first thought was that some beast had fallen dead, and was thus being devoured. Capt. Rogers remarked that the supposed insects could not be insects; they were altogether too large, and altogether too small for birds of prey.

Here was a mystery, which needed only to be explored. The party advanced to the spot as hurriedly as possible, when lo! to their utter astonishment, it was found that it was a man who had fallen, instead of a beast, and that this man had been beset and overcome by vampire bats.

What to do first, they did not know. They dared not approach too near the spot, for fear of being attacked in a similiar manner. But not a moment was to be lost. The poor, unfortunate fellow was yet alive, for every now and then there was a visible movement of the body.

"I have an idea," said Capt. Rogers, which may work well in this case. Let us charge our rifles well with powder, and fire into the midst of them."

The party thought the idea a good one, and made haste to carry it into effect.

The discharge was heard, a dense, sulphurous gas was generated above the prostrate victim, and the vampires, in terrible consternation, flew away with rapid speed.

After the smoke had cleared away, the gentlemen approached the spot. Many of the vampires were lying around, evidently disabled from the effects of the powder. These were mercilessly crushed by the butt ends of the guns.

With all possible haste, attention was given to the victim. He were only a breech cloth. The sight was fearful to behold, and we forbear to picture it in the vivid language of Capt. Rogers. The fellow was literally punctured all over; the ground was moistened with the blood flowing from his veins, and the blood still poured out.

Not one of the party knew enough of surgery to be able to suggest any remedy for relief; and all of them were too much excited too conjure up a remedy from common-sense and experience.

Several minutes elapsed before a thing was done, except to give the man a draught of fresh water.

At length, one of the gentlemen, recalling to mind the fact that the tobacco-ashes are available for the sting, and believing that vampires sting rather than bite, removed a quantity of tobacco from his pouch, and, laying it on the ground, at once set it on fire. Two of the other gentlemen did likewise.

Soon enough ashes were obtained to try the experiment. Having washed away the bloody gore, they smeared these ashes over the lacerated portion of the man's body. The sole effect was to stop the blood, and to cause an intense smarting.

The fellow seemed at last to rally from his miserable plight, and, failing to raise his head, he made signs of gratitude to those who had so kindly befriended him.

After a short time, he was enabled to speak; and, through the Malay interpreter who accompanied the gentlemen, the following facts were obtained:

He said that he was on the way to a neighboring village, and that, when night had come on, he had lain down to sleep until sunrise. Towards morning he was suddenly awakened by a loud noise, and was terribly frightened to find himself lying in blood.

Strange to say, he felt little or no pain; but, on endeavoring to get up, he fell back completely exhausted, and soon he was so weak as to be unable to move at all.

These are the facts gained after many pauses; and it was with great difficulty that even this slight information was acquired. The fellow could speak only with the greatest effort, and then it was so nearly inaudible as to be barely understood.

The remainder of the story is best given nearly in the words of Capt. Rogers, who concludes:

"There was no use talking further about the matter. I suggested to my friends that there was only small chance of saving the man's life; for it really seemed as if fully two-thirds of his blood had flowed out. Mr. H—— said that it might be well to carry him to a spot, only a few rods off, where the trees would shelter him from the sun. It was a good idea, and we did so. For nearly four hours and a half we sat and watched the man, trying our very best to think of something for his good. He was too far gone to eat anything, and we had to pour water down his throat by degrees.

"Well, the worst came at last, as we knew it would. Suddenly the man threw his arms upwards. They fell with a thud—and all was over.

"We merely laid the body in a hole near by, and covered it with leaves."

Manitoba, the Speaking God.

Far away in the great Northwest lies a lake which has given a name to the province formed in the Red River country known as Manitoba. From an island in this lake, in the stillness of night, issues a mysterious sound. The Ojibway Indians will on no account approach this island or make a landing there. They believe it to be the home of the "Manitoba, the Speaking God." This curious sound is caused by the beating of the waves on the large, flat, thin stones that line the shores. At the northern extremity of the island there is a low cliff of fine-grained, compact limestone, which, under the stroke of a hammer, clinks like steel. The waves beating on the shore at the foot of the cliff cause the fallen fragments to rub against each other and give out a sound resembling the chimes of distant church bells. This phenomenon occurs when the gales blow from the north, and then as the winds subside low wailing sounds like whispering voice are heard in the air. Travelers assert that the effect is very impressive, and they have been awakened at night under the impression that they have been listening to church bells.

HERE AND THERE.

The opinion is entertained now by many men of science that the art of making stone for structural purposes is prehistoric, and that the pyramids were, in fact built of artificial blocks manufactured from the surrounding plain.

A blast furnace and rolling mill have been erected lately in Bogota. The machinery was bought in the United States, and it cost the owners as much to carry this machinery from the Magdalena, as the purchase money and the ocean freight combined.

A good many parties connected with the United States seem anxious to break up the Panama Canal Company with a view of securing the American Government the possession of the important work in which M. de Lesseps is now engaged.

"Dere trubble in de church. De wale ob de temple am rent in twain; de congregation am done gone busted, and dar was no preachin' dis mawnin'," was the picturesque description of church troubles in an African church by an aged member.

Mr. Thomas Robinson, senior member of a prominent firm in Indianapolis, is entitled to the belt for strict observance of the Sabbath. He will not permit business letters written on Saturday to be mailed till Monday, because otherwise they would travel on Sunday.

Sam Jones has declined an offer of $100 a night for 100 lectures, on the ground that "when I go on a lecture platform I lose my grip upon the people as an evangelist," and he defines his work as an attempt "to get up some sweet now and now, instead of so much sweet bye and bye."

A Cleveland man is said to have succeeded in making a solderless copper float, a thing long regarded as impossible. Besides being solderless, it is claimed to possess strength in a degree not heretofore attained, a 2½x4½ inch float standing long-continued tests of 200 pounds steam pressure without either collapsing or filling with water.

The largest dynamo in the world is being set up in Cleveland, Ohio. It will be thirteen feet long, five and a half wide and weigh ten tons—four times the size and ability of the "Jumbo" machine exhibited by Edison at the Philadelphia Exposition in 1884. Five hundred horse power will be required to drive it, and its current will furnish incandescent lights of about 20,000 candle power.

Mrs. Ann Jane Mercer, who recently died in Philadelphia, has bequeathed her fine estate, called "The Mount," in Montgomery County, Pa., and $100,000 for the purpose of establishing there an institution to be called "The John C. Mercer Home for Disabled Clergymen of the Presbyterian Faith.' John C. Mercer her husband, died five or six years ago, leaving Mrs. Mercer his entire property worth about $1,000,000.

A London journal, quoting statistics to back it up, presents as a moral paradox the statement that the most poorly paid working girls in the metropolis are those engaged in the work of sewing and binding Bibles. It adds that "for every heathen abroad who can be induced to use the sacred volume for anything else than gun-wadding a dozen of these girls are driven to perdition at home."

A well-known minister was sent south from New Jersey a few years ago to labor among the colored people. They received him with many demonstrations of joy, and at the first meeting which he held one old colored preacher prayed for him with great earnestness, thus: "O Lord! bress dis yer dear brudder what's come down from de Norf to preach the gospil to us. 'Noint him wid de kerosene ile ob salvashin, and set him on fire."

As to the Cree translation of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," it has been stated that this laborious work was done by the Bishop of Albany. This is a misconception. Archdeacon Vincent, who is himself of Indian blood, has spent years of labor on the work, and is now in London revising it for the press. The misconception probably arose from the fact that the book, which is being published by the church Missionary Society, is to be issued with the Episcopal imprimatur.

The wearing of the tires on buggy and wagon wheels is quite an interesting study. On a rocky road they wear rounding, on a clay road flat, while in sand they cut out in the center. Through Honey Lake Valley vehicles much used have two hollow places all the way around the wheel. There will be a little ridge in the centre, with a hollow on each side and a high place on each edge. Some of the stage wheels are so and many of the farmers' buggies and wagons.

There seems to be a difference between Cincinnati and Chicago reporters. Sam Jones says: "I don't understand why you newspaper people are so hard to reach. I should think you'd be easy, seeing that you see so much of the hellowness, sham and wickedness of the world, but you ain't. I can reach you as newspaper men, I can touch your appreciation by smart or witty sayings, mayhap, but you are awful hard to touch as men. Your hearts are difficult of access. Now in Cincinnati I converted several reporters, but in Chicago I could not touch one with a 40-foot pole."

A saw without teeth that will cut a steel rail in two minutes is in operation at the Central Hudson shops in Greenbush, N. Y. The saw is run by a ninety-horse power engine, more power than is required to run all the other machinery in the shops, and is 38 inches in diameter and three-eighths of an inch thick at the edge. The disk is made of Bessemer steel, and runs at a very high rate of speed. While in operation a band of fire encircles the saw, and the many sparks flying from the revolving disk resembles a display of pyrotechnics. To keep the saw cool and prevent it from cracking, a tank of water is placed above the machine from which a small stream runs down and drops on the saw while in motion. By this plan one saw will cut nearly 3,000 rails before it is worn out. A steel rail, after about six years' constant use, becomes battered at the ends, and by cutting them off, the rails can be used in branch and switch tracks. Rails are cut by this machine for the whole line of the Central Hudson railroad. The saw, while cutting, bears down hard on the rail, the end of which is left as smooth as the bottom of a flat-iron. One remarkable thing about the machine is that the chips cut from the rail fly back under the saw with such force as to form a solid piece of steel nearly as firm as the rail itself.

MY NEW FRIEND.

CHAPTER III

As the reader may suppose, I was in feverish expectation of a summons to wait upon Messrs. Bunner, Wregge, and Carrowble—the firm for which Mr. Scate was acting—hour by hour, almost minute by minute; but the business took a very different turn. Mr. Scate called one day, out of the time at which he usually paid his visits, which was generally in the evening, and said that the firm would not trouble me to call; they were quite satisfied, he said, with what they had heard from him; and not caring to multiply the agents with whom they dealt directly, preferred to consider my transactions as a branch of his own. This being the case, he would at once, if I were agreeable, commence our joint work by either seeing people at my household, or making appointments to which I should attend.

I could have no possible objection to this, beyond the grave one that I had no experience in buying and selling, and did not even know what kind of goods I was expected to examine. To all this he had conclusive answers. A man "with his head screwed on the right way," as mine was, would have no difficulty in picking up such knowledge; while at first he would see everything right for me, and when he was obliged to be away, would leave me instructions how far to go in any purchase. But there! it was making mountains of molehills to talk in that strain. Several interviews of this kind took place; and I could not help thinking that Scate took care never to hold them in the presence of Mr. Chelps; and I sometimes actually thought he must lie in wait in the neighbourhood to see the old gentleman go out, so promptly did he look in directly afterwards. But Mr. Chelps was so interested in the matter, so anxious for actual work to begin, he said, that he generally extracted a pretty full account from me; besides holding long conversations on his own prospective share with Mr. Scate.

Among other preparations for the agency, Mr. Scate had some office furniture brought in; so that, what with a massive table and desk, half-a-dozen heavy chairs, with various racks and shelves fitted on the walls, my front parlour assumed quite a solid, banking, or life-assurance aspect, which met the approval not only of Mr. Scate, but of Mr. Chelps.

The first transaction which was completed in the new office, took place very suddenly—to me; and was surprising by its brevity and various special features, common perhaps to my novel business, but altogether different from my previous experience. It was conducted thus. At twilight one evening, only a few days after the subject was first broached, for Mr. Scate would lose no time in the matter, he came in, and repaired to the office. He had not been there five minutes, when a man knocked at our door and asked for him. It so happened that I opened the door to this person, who, in the few words he spoke, seemed to have an unpleasantly furtive way with him; and although not disguised in any particular manner, his hat was so slouched over his brows, and the collar of his coat so pulled up, that it was impossible to distinguish his features clearly. I showed him into the office, and went down-stairs. As I did so, I thought for an instant that I caught sight of Mr. Chelps's face, in the dusky gloom of the staircase, peering over the banisters. I paused to look again; but no one was there, and I went on.

In a few minutes Mr. Scate called down the speaking tube which he had caused to be carried from the office to our sitting-room, and asked me to step up. I complied, and found him with the stranger I had previously admitted; but their figures were barely discernible, as they were sitting without a light, and the twilight had now almost changed to darkness. I naturally noticed this, and offered to procure a light.

"No, thank ye," returned Mr. Scate. "Our business is finished, and I am going out directly. I wished to introduce you to this gentleman, who will be here again to-morrow, or the next night, and will transact some business with you. Mr—a—a—Mr. ——"

"Jerry Wilkins, you know," said the other, as Scate hesitated.

"To be sure!—of course!" exclaimed the latter. "Mr. Wilkins, this is our new agent, Mr. Matley, who will carry on the business at this branch for the present; so you will know who to ask for when I am not here."

"Yes; I shall know him," returned the stranger. His words were not a direct reply to Mr. Scate's remark, and although I could scarcely see him in the darkness, I felt he was eyeing me narrowly. However, there was little time for this or anything more, as Scate rose from his seat, and in a few words intimated that our business was concluded.

I opened the door for them, and they went out, not exactly together, for Mr. Wilkins left at once, while Scate lingered for a couple of minutes on the threshold with me, although he seemed to have nothing particular to say. As I closed the door, I again thought I saw Mr. Chelps, this time at the farther end of our little entrance hall; but it was very dark there, and I might easily have been mistaken. I at once lighted the gas, and went down to our breakfast-room, where I found the old gentleman calmly smoking his pipe in the dark, and by himself; for Susan was absent, making some trifling purchases in the neighbourhood.

I apologised for his not having a light; but, in his usual cheerful manner, he said it was of no consequence, as he liked to sit and smoke in a half-dreamy state, to which twilight, or even darkness, was very favorable. He was chatty on other subjects, but, for a wonder, did not refer to business, which indeed, was not spoken of until my wife returned. She had gone out just after I had admitted Mr. Jerry Wilkins, and so naturally asked me who the visitor was. But even while I told her, Mr. Chelps was too much engrossed by his pipe to pay any attention to the subject, or at anyrate to join in the conversation.

Though on various occasions Mr. Chelps indulged in a glass or two of grog, it is only right that I should say that he never, even at first, gave us the idea that he was an intemperate man. He certainly seemed led away a little by the example of Scate, who occasionally took, we thought, a malicious pleasure in tempting the old gentleman. We did not and could not like Scate, while we both felt favourably disposed to our ledger from the beginning.

The next day Scate came early, and had a brief interview with me in the office. His object was to say that Mr. Wilkins would probably call that night, and if so, would bring a parcel, of which I was to take charge and for which I was to give him forty-five pounds. This money he gave me all in gold.

"Am I to examine or check the goods?" I began.

"O no," he said; "it is all settled about them. We know Jerry, and have done many bits of business with him, so we can trust him."

"Will you give me a receipt for him to sign," I asked, "or will he draw one up?"

"Receipt don't signify between people who can trust each other," he replied.

"Why, you do not mean to say you are going to pay all this money without a receipt!" I exclaimed in amazement; for such a proceeding was horribly opposed to all my experience.

"Yes, with Jerry," he returned carelessly; "it's our way. You will get into it soon, old fellow, and when you come to know your customers, you will deal with them accordingly. By-the-by, you may let old Chelps know that you have begun business; you may show him the money, to let him see that it's a real thing; but don't let him be in the room when you pay Wilkins. In fact, he had better not see Wilkins at all." All this was odd; but as I knew literally nothing of the business as yet, or how the unseen firm conducted it, I could not say anything against it.

Mr. Scate added one piece of information this day which was welcome. He said that my engagement would be considered to commence from this date; that a rent would be paid for the use of the office, the amount of which would depend upon his report; and upon his report also, to be sent in at the end of four weeks—when I should be introduced to the firm—it would depend whether I was paid by salary or commission. "And you may rely upon my report saying the best it can for you, old fellow," he continued. "I could have got this settled at once; but I know what our principles are, and I am confident that to wait a bit will make a difference of fifty pounds a year to you; so you can draw on me for five, or ten if you choose, while the month runs on, and pay me at your leisure."

It was impossible not to feel grateful to a man who did so much for a stranger, and who was so perfectly disinterested; yet—although I hated myself for allowing such a feeling to exist—I was conscious, even while I was thanking Scate, and thanking him sincerely—I was conscious, I say, that I was gradually growing almost to detest the man, my benefactor though he was.

Scate did not come in again that day; and I took the first opportunity of telling Mr. Chelps what my instructions were; showed him the money, as suggested; told him that I was now fairly in the employ of the firm; that I was to be introduced to them in four weeks' time, and that my pay would be settled on such a scale as the report of Mr. Scate justified. He asked me, after a moment's reflection, what the address of the firm was. I told him that I had asked the same question of Scate, who had replied, that I had better postpone all inquiries till the month was over; they would prefer it.

"Ah, I see," said the old gentleman "Until that time, you are, as one may say, on probation. Very cautious of them, very, not to allow Mr. Scate even to reveal his address until then.—But I like them all the better for it, sir; I do, indeed. Now if I get my money in a few days, I may hope—as Mr. Scate holds out the most favourable expectations to me—to be introduced at the same time as yourself. I should like that, because, of course, I should not invest without knowing something of the people, no matter how high my opinion of Mr. Scate might be."

I agreed with the old gentleman that he was quite right in this.

A man went by with plants in a barrow that afternoon, and Mr. Chelps declaring—rather to my surprise—that he was an enthusiastic admirer of flowers, bought a number, which he told Mrs. Matley—who really was fond of them—he would plant in the front garden after the sun went down. He was as good as his words too, or nearly; for he went into the garden with spade and water-can, and slowly—for it was plain he was not an expert gardener—commenced his work. I offered to help him; but the old gentleman said that half his pleasure in shrubs and flowers would be lost unless he planted them himself; so he went on until it was almost dark, making, however, but little progress.

It was between twilight and dark when a cab stopped at our gate, and a knock following, I went to the door, expecting to find—as it proved—Mr. Jerry Wilkins. I had lost no time in answering the knock; but Mr. Chelps was already in conversation with the visitor, and inviting him, as I could hear, to admire some beautiful bulbs he was holding out for his inspection. Mr. Wilkins, who had struck me as being of a somewhat morose turn when I admitted him on the previous evening, looked gloomier and sulkier now. He turned with a very uncivil grunt from the garrulous old gentleman, and came in the moment I opened the door. Mr. Chelps, however, smiled with imperturbable good-humour, but, as it was too dark to see any longer, gave up his gardening for the night.

"You are not an enthusiast in flowers, Mr. Wilkins," I began. "I am afraid you did not see any particular beauty in the bulb which Mr. Chelps so greatly admires."

"Beauty, no!" said Mr. Wilkins. "What do I want with a thing as looks as if it was pulled out of a rope of onions; and very likely was. He's an old fool. And yet Ned Scate is going to do business with him, isn't he?"

I could make no reply for the moment, the man's vulgar familiarity, and his knowledge of Scate's plans, so thoroughly staggered me.

"But a regular fool will suit Ned Scate better than anything else, especially if he has a good opinion of himself," continued Mr. Wilkins, not heeding my silence.—"Well, governor, there's the stuff, and I want five-and-forty pounds of you."

"—," I said; "Mr. Scate told me I was to give you forty-five pounds; and as for a receipt"——

"Well, then, hand over the cash, and let me step it," interrupted the man. "What's the use of keeping the cab at the door? Ned Scate never told you to ask for a receipt, I know." A moment's pause here, while he rapidly ran over the gold. "All right, governor. Will you come to the corner and have a glass?—You won't? Well, that's your business. Mine is to clear out; so good-night." Saying this, he went, leaving me with a growing feeling of dislike to the "agency," with which indeed I had never been greatly enamoured.

Mr. Chelps, who, as he explained, had gone out for a short stroll, returned soon after Wilkins left, and joining Mrs. Matley and myself, began what promised to be a long, as it was certainly an unconnected account of his gardening experiences in the country; but ere he was fairly in the midst of his narrative, a knock at the street door was heard; and, to my astonishment, Lizzie brought down a message to the effect that a gentleman wished to see me at the Three Bells, a tavern in the next street. It immediately occurred to me that it must be that dreadful Wilkins, who wished to transact some fresh piece of the most irregular business in which I was engaged, and this was perhaps his way of managing it. I hurried off accordingly, Mr. Chelps saying he would smoke a pipe in the front garden until I came back, so that he should be out of the way while Mrs Matley and Lizzie prepared the supper.

I hastened away, as I have said, and went into each compartment of the bar at the Three Bells, which was a large place, without seeing Wilkins or any one that I knew. On my looking for the second or third time into the most select division, where I had naturally expected to find him, a big, square-built man, a customer who was leaning against the bar, said civilly: "Are you looking for anybody, sir?"

It occurred to me that this after all might be the sender of the message, so at a venture, I replied: "Yes; I am indeed looking for some one; but the awkward part of it is that I do not know who I am looking for. A lad came to my house, and said a gentleman wished to see me here; but I think there must have been some mistake."

"I am sure there is!" exclaimed the stranger. "What a pity it is you cannot get the simplest thing done in a straightforward manner. I sent a boy with that message to an old acquaintance.—May I ask where you live, sir?"

"No. 9 Victoria Louisa Terrace," I replied.

"The young idiot!" said the stranger. "I told him a totally different number. It is evidently through me you have been brought here, sir; and though I did not come myself, I must apologise for the utter stupidity of my messenger. You must have a glass of something with me."

I tried to decline this; but the stranger was clearly one of those who think nothing is complete until ratified by the wine-pledge, or what serves in modern life for the wine-pledge; so I had to stay and assure him of my completely excusing him, and listen to his repeated apologies over a glass of ale, before I could get away.

I found Mr. Chelps leaning over the gate, and smoking tranquilly. When I told him of my adventures, the old gentleman laughed heartily. I thought business was concluded for that evening; but at the very last moment, just indeed as we were going to bed, Scate came in for the parcel left by Mr. Jerry Wilkins. I went with him into the office, where I experienced a momentary "turn" by not being able to lay my hand upon the packet in the dark, which I made sure I could have done. On procuring a light, however, I found I had merely made the mistake of supposing that the parcel was on a chair to the right of the door, when in reality it was upon one to the left.

"I shall be round early to-morrow," said Mr. Scate, "as, since I saw you, I have had a foreign letter, which you must answer. It is from Belgium, and will lead to a great deal of business. You understand French, I believe?"

I said I had a fair knowledge of that language.

"That's a good job," continued Scate. "It has been a staggerer to me over and over again, the not knowing anything of the parlyvoo jargon. This will be a big transaction, you will find.—And I say, Matley!"—this exclamation was uttered just as he reached the door, as if it were a sudden thought—"just sound old Chelps about his money. If he can get it in two or three days it will be just in time to make such a profit for him as he never got in Australia, or wherever he has been. Tell him that; and tell him that afterwards it may be too late. I will come round and see him myself as well."

He went rapidly away with the parcel; and I had a long talk with my wife, before I went to sleep that night, upon the singular features of the employment on which I had entered; and we half decided that unless I saw the principals at the end of the month, and liked them when I did see them, I would not continue the engagement.

I spoke to Mr. Chelps in the morning, as desired about his investment; and the old gentleman seemed anxious not to lose the promised chance, and said that perhaps, by sacrificing a trifle of interest, he might get his money a day or two earlier than agreed, which would be in about a week later. Perhaps Mr. Scate would show him a way out of the difficulty. But it was not likely that he would give up all this money without an introduction to the firm, and being well satisfied of their stability, or, in lieu of this, some tangible security meanwhile.

As soon as Mr. Scate came, I told him this. He declared he greatly applauded the old gentleman's caution, and asked me to call him down, that we might talk things over. I did so; and Mr. Chelps came at once.

"You are naturally desirous of knowing were you put your money, and what it is for, Mr. Chelps"——began Scate.

"I am, sir, naturally anxious, as you say," interposed the old gentleman, feeling for his eyeglass, as he always did when business was the topic of conversation. Securing it at last, he fixed it to his eyes, and looked earnestly, yet with an expression which was ridiculously helpless, at Mr. Scate. "No offence, I hope," he continued; "but you see a thousand pounds, or eleven hundred, is a great deal to me; and although I have every confidence in you, yet"——

"No apology, my dear sir," exclaimed Scate; "your conduct is strictly business-like, and I will satisfy you. One of my principals, if not two of them, shall wait upon you here, in the first place,"

"Oh, I'm sure I would not trouble them so far," said Mr. Chelps.

But Scate interrupted him, and went on with the same boastful swaggering air:

"They shall come, sir; and you shall arrange them, if you like each other, for a final interview at headquarters. Their reference, I may remark, will be to three tolerably well-known establishments—the Bank of England, sir; Baring's, sir; and Rothschild's, sir. Are they good enough?

"Splendid! Oh! I'm sure," commenced Mr. Chelps; but here his eyeglass fell down, and the interruption gave Scate an opportunity of going on.

"It is possible, Mr. Chelps," he said, "that the Belgian transaction I have spoken of may be finished before you can arrange with my principals, unless you can have your money at once. In fact, I know this will be the case. Mr. Matley, who is luckily a capital French scholar, has written this morning a formal acceptance of these foreigners' terms. They will telegraph to their agent, who will be here on the third day from this with the dock-notes of the goods, which are lying here. I have already seen my principals to-day, and took upon me to say—being anxious to forward your wishes—that I could have your money by that time. Accordingly, as the total required will be sixteen hundred pounds, they handed me five hundred pounds in notes. Here they are." He pulled out a bulky pocket-book as he said this. "They are strictly ready-money people, as I told you."

"What! the Belgians?" exclaimed Chelps, whose eyes sparkled at the sight of the rustling notes. "And what are their names?"

"I did not mean them exactly," returned Scate. "I meant that my people were ready-money men; but so for the matter of that, are Belgians, especially when they are selling anything. Their names are Delrel, Vianet, and Company. You may have heard of them?"

"Yes; I think I have heard of them," said Chelps. "And are all those bank-notes?" His interest in the Belgian firm was evidently small compared with his interest in bank notes, from which he had never taken his eyes since Scate produced them.

"Yes; fifty tens. Look at 'em!" replied the latter, passing the notes towards the old gentleman, and once again shaking down the eye-glass. "Well, sir," continued Scate after a moment's pause, during which the notes had been handed back again, "you shall have the delivery-order of these goods as security, until you are quite satisfied about my principals; and that is exactly equal to giving you five hundred pounds of their money to hold without any security at all."

"So it is—so it is!" chuckled Chelps. "Nothing could be better. I will go into the City, sir, and sell out to-day. My broker will let me have the money in advance if I like. Oh, I can manage all that; and I shall be quite satisfied, especially if I can see one of the firm; I must own I should like that."

"You shall do so, sir," answered Scate. "One of them shall be here to see the completion of the transaction. He will like to do so, being Mr. Matley's first piece of business on their account. Then, sir, in his presence, I will give you the dock-warrants, and you will give me eleven hundred pounds. I may say, as between friends, that these things are already as good as sold for two thousand pounds. There's business, sir. Our firm knows were to plant the articles."

"My dear sir," exclaimed Chelps, "it's as good as done. If I had any doubts before, what you now say, and the sight of these notes, have quite removed them, and I shall not be easy now until I have had the pleasure of seeing you and your friends together."

Mr. Scate shook his hand heartily, restored the notes to his pocket-book, took the letter I had written; and then, after a most expressive wink at me, which implied anything but respect for his new partner, he left.

SUMMER SMILES.

A lawyer may be muscular, and at the same time a fee-bill man.

The strawberry short-cake is not long for this world.

Which is the longest word in the English language? "Smiles," because there's a mile between the first and last letters.

"What's in a name?" a recent traveller was heard to exclaim. "Why, about the hottest country on the globe is Chili."

What word is that composed of five letters from which if you take two one remains? Stone.

More than four thousand devices for coupling have been patented, and yet thousands of bachelors and maidens go it alone in this country.

An Irish magistrate asked a prisoner if he was married. "No," replied the man. "Then," said His Worship, amid peals of laughter, "it's a good thing for your wife."

"What are the Blenkinsop girls in mourning for?" "Their parrot." "In mourning for a parrot! Why, it's a positive sacrilege." "Oh, but this one could repeat the Lord's Prayer, you know."

A Philadelphia gentleman, after being shown about the city recently by a citizen of the Hub, said to his cicerone: "Boston isn't laid out so well as Philadelphia." "No," replied the latter," "but it will be when it is as dead."

"Are you a philanthroplst, sir?" asked an old gentleman of a young man who was distributing a quantity of butterscotch to some children. "Am I a what?" said the young man. "A philanthropist?" "No, sir; I am a dentist."

They were at the wedding breakfast when the groom said to the little girl: "You have a new brother, now, you know." "Yeth," responded the little one. "Ma seth it wath Lettie's lasth chance, so she'd better take it." The rest of the little one's talk was drowned in a clatter of knives and forks.

"Don't you think this bonnet is a little too young for me?" inquired Mrs. Shuttle of Job, as she was doing her final "priaking" at the glass, before going out. "Never mind if it is. You won't have it more than six weeks before it will be "too old," and you will want a new one."

A parish clerk once gave out that "Mr. A. and Mr. B. would preach every Sunday to all eternity. He meant alternately. Another mistake was "that there would be no service next Wednesday, 'kas master had gone a-fishin' for another clergyman." Officiate was the word intended.

YOUNG FOLKS.

"Well Enough."

This was a favorite phrase of Georgie's. She used it upon all occasions and lived up to it too. When she was thirteen her mother gave her a little bed-room all to herself, which she was to keep clean and in order with her own hands. One morning she was in there putting on her coat and hat in great haste to go to school. Her mother, happening to be passing, opened the door and looked in:

"Why Georgie!" she exclaimed, "why didn't you put your room in order?"

"I did!" said Georgie going on buttoning with rapid fingers.

"My dear child just look at it!" said her mother with an expressive gesture.

The pillows were placed crookedly on the bed, the towels flung on the rack without being folded, all the bureau drawers open a little, and a piece of string hanging out of one, etc.

"O, mamma!" Georgie exclaimed impatiently. "It will do well enough I'm in such a hurry. I shall be late at school."

"You must not be late at school," said her mother, "but you must put your room in complete order as soon as you come home. I don't want you to get in the habit of doing things just half."

It was the same way with sewing. Mrs. Blair insisted that her girls should know how to sew, and Georgie learned very readily, but was so careless and so easily satisfied that her work often looked very badly, and was a great worry to her mother.

"O! won't it do well enough, mamma?" Georgie would say. "What's the use of being so awfully particular?"

"It won't do until it is done just as well as you can do it," Mrs. Blair would reply, and many a piece of work the young lady was obliged to pick out and do over.

She carried the "well enough" system into her musical studies also, and of course it did not work well there. She was fond of music, learned with great ease, and played spiritedly, but her performance was spoiled by the way she had of dropping notes, and slurring over hard passages which she was too lazy to practice sufficiently. It was in vain her teacher lectured her about such carelessness, and told her she must practice the difficult parts patiently until she could play them as rapidly as the rest; out of his hearing she played in her own fashion and said it did well enough.

"What is that you are playing?" Elizabeth asked one time.

"It is that new galop Mary Haines played the other evening," Georgie replied. "Isn't it pretty?"

"Yes," said Elizabeth, "but it doesn't sound just as it did when Mary played it."

"Well, I don't play it exactly as she did. You see the base skips about so that I have to go down for the lower F's and B flats. I can't play fast enough, so I just play them all up here; and then I don't play the octaves in right hand—just take the upper note."

"Seems to me," said her sister, "it would be better to go slower at first and learn it right so as to play as it is written."

"O, this sounds well enough," said Georgie and banged away perfectly satisfied.

Her father had a scrap book in which he pasted newspaper articles he wished to keep. Sometimes when he was busy he asked Elizabeth to paste the pieces in, and this she did very neatly. Once when she was away from home he said: "Georgie, won't you put these pieces in my book?"

"Yes, sir, of course," she replied, quite proud to be asked.

He showed her how he wanted it done, and she set to work. At first she was very careful to get them all straight and smooth, so the first page she did was just as good as any of Elizabeth's; but soon she became tired of going so slowly and particularly, and began to slight the work. There were two or three little bits that were very hard to fit in nicely and instead of persevering until they were right she hurried them in any way, saying to herself: "O, well it won't matter if such little bits are crooked. It will look well enough."

But it looked very badly, the crooked pieces spoiling the whole page.

When her father looked at the book he said: "I'm very much obliged to you, Georgie; but—I'm afraid my little girl hasn't a very straight eye."

"O, yes, I have, papa," said Georgie. "I know those pieces are a little crooked, but it is so very little I thought you wouldn't mind."

Her father said nothing more, but he never asked her again to paste in pieces, and once when he brought out the book to show a certain political article to a gentleman he was talking with, she noticed he turned the botched page over very quickly, as if he were ashamed of it.

This is about the way Georgie does everything, and if she does not break herself of this bad habit of doing things just any way at all she is not likely to grow up to be a very useful and reliable woman.

Slay the Exhumer.

The longest word in the English, or rather Welsh, language has, after a long period of oblivion, been once more exhumed. It is Llanfairpwllgwngyllgertrobgllgerchwyrnby-llgegerbwllsantysilliogogogoch. This word of 70 letters and 22 syllables, the name of a village in Wales, constituted the subject of a lecture lately given by the Rev. J. King, M. A., at the museum, Berwick, in which he showed that it means:—"St. Mary's white hazel pool, near the turning pool, near the whirlpool, very near the pool by Llantsilio, fronting the rocky islet of Goge."

A Haverhill woman refused to shoe her hens because her husband, a shoemaker, was on strike."

They were sitting as close as the sofa would permit. She looked with ineffable tenderness into his noble blue eyes. "George," she murmured, with a tremor in her voice, "didn't you tell me once that you would be willing to do any great act of heroism for my sake?" "Yes, Fannie, and I gladly reiterate that statement now," he replied in confident tones. "No noble Roman of old was fired with a loftier ambition, a braver resolution than I." "Well, George, I want you to do something real heroic for me." "Speak, darling; what is it?" "Ask me to be your wife. We've been feeling long enough."

The Standard.

MARKDALE JUNE 10 1886

MARKDALE TO GODERICH.

On Tuesday morning, June 1st, we boarded the train south, changing cars at Cardwell Junction we took the Hamilton & North-Western, arriving in Georgetown at 10:40, making close connection with the G. T. R., and reaching Stratford at 1:15 where a train was waiting to convey us to Goderich, where we arrived at 3:40, sharp on time.

Vegetation along the above line is in much the same stage of advancement. The country from Georgetown to Guelph is generally broken, stony and rocky, but on leaving Guelph westward there is a vast improvement, while the districts passed through in the vicinity of Berlin, Stratford, Seaforth and Clinton are unbroken, and a delightfully prosperous agricultural country.

GODERICH

is the county town of Huron, is situated on the banks of the Maitland River where it empties into Lake Huron. The plan of the town is strangely novel. The county court house stands in the centre of the town, and is encircled with a beautiful park in which flowers, shrubs and shade trees abound, faced with many of the principal places of business, which encompass the park on all sides. A park surrounded by bnsiness places is a rare sight. These places of business around the court house and park have a frontage of about a third of a mile. The roadway or street, between the park and those business places is very wide and level, in fact all the streets are, we believe, a uniform width of six rods. The streets point from the court house in all directions. East St. West St. North St and South Street beisdes one between each of these making in all eight streets direct from the court house, and these multiply in both directions as you proceed from this centre in a manner very suggestive of a spider web, and equally as entangling to those who fall into its meshes as many of the Conference delegates will indignantly agree (ask Mr. Bowes.) The streets abound with shade trees, and are wonderfully clean; the sidewalks wide, being all twelve feet; but there is not half as much wooden sidewalks in the whole of the town as there is in Markdale; the walks are gravel, and are hard and smooth; the streets are also hard and smooth, while mud is a thing, comparatively speaking, unknown in the place. We cannot go into general particulars in regard to the public interests of the town, such as the great salt works, the greatest portion of which have been given up for want of a demand for that article at remunerative prices.

THE CONFERENCE

has progressed from day to day, commencing on Tuesday the 2nd and closingon Tuesday the 8th. Over 200 delegates were present, and the various matters of business were dealt with in a thoroughly practical and business manner. The people of the town have shown commendable liberality in providing for the wants of the hundreds of strangers attending Conference, while all appeared to thoroughly enjoy their visit both in reference to Conference work and society. The next annual conference will be held at Galt, commencing the first Wednesday in June.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

Mr. Standard Editor:

Being as you are editin' the paper this week, I thought, as I have had a little experience in the matter I might be able to advise you. Now, in the first place, I have learned that the Editor-in-chief is away for a while to the salt wells, as a foreign missionary, and that you, a risin' editor, have took upon you the editorship for some time. A serious responsibility, boy, very! I thought I'd give you the benefit of my experience as an editor. Now, while I was out west, I ran a weekly paper on the *im*proved style for about three months, after that I found the subscribers of the paper were running me on the *ap*proved style. Once I ventured in a mild way to advise a man to keep his wife at home, and not let her go out gossiping to her neighbors; he did not take kindly to the advice, and the result was I was waylaid one night coming home from church. Again I was trying to add a tone to the morals of the community and I called a mother's attention to the fact that her son, if not better looked after, would be a liar, loafer, rogue, and likely a drunkard, and advised her to use the broomhandle on him; for my goodness in giving this kindly advice I, myself, the editor of a respectable paper, was pommelled with the broomhandle by the infuriated mother. One piece of advice I would give therefore is, to let the women alone; another, don't say anything about anybody; don't try to report a concert in the absence of the boss editor, it's folly, simply foolhardiness. I give you this advice for your own personal safety, as much as for the bosses safety on his return. I hope you will act on it before your office is surrounded by a howling mob.

Yours for the best,
PHIN CONROY.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—There appeared an article in the Flesherton Advance over the signature of W. G. Glassford, supposed to be an answer to ours in your paper of the 20th May. We did not say General Gordon was not registered; what we said was this, "General Gordon is not nor can he be registered either in the Clydesdale nor the Shire stud books." This statement is strictly correct.

Now, for the public's information we will show exactly where he is registered. General Gordon is registered as follows: [A 46] Canadian Clyde Appendex whish is kept for the purpose of registering half-breeds and mongrels. Mr. Glassford knows this, and if he is an honest man, why does he not own up and give General Gordon's pedigree just as it is? Mr. Glassford says it is easily known what our motives were in the article we published, meaning no doubt we were envious because hr was in the same business we were. Such is not the case; we envy no man.

Now, to set for ever at rest this pedigree business, we will bet Mr. Glassford $100 to $10 that General Gordon's pedigree is just as we have stated. Now, let Mr. Glassford either put up or shut up.

TRIMBLE & PICKELL.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—Allow me to congratulate you on your success as an editor. Along with this I would advise you to not be so hard on the boys, you know you are one of them.

Massey Harvester.

Glenelg Tp., June 2, 1886.

From Daniel McCarty,
Markdale P. O., Co. Grey:

I bought a Massey Harvester from your agent, Mr. Thos. Williscroft, which has given good satisfaction, having cut a very heavy crop of grain in 1885, over 100 acres without a break. It by far exceeded my expectations, having cut very heavy grain, on very rough and stony ground, with soft bottom.where I thought it impossible for a machine to work. Did I require another machine it would not cost me a moment's thought to decide as to what machine to buy. I would advise all my neighbors to buy a Massey Machine when requiring one.

Conservative Convention.

MASS MEETING IN DURHAM.

The Conservative Convention held in Durham on Tuesday last for the purpose of selecting candidates to represent South Grey at the next general election was a grand success. Delegates were present from every part of the riding, and it was said by those of experience that it was the largest Conservative Convention ever held in the riding. Dr. Jamieson, President of the Conservative Association, accepted the chair. A few minutes after 10 the Dr. called the meeting to order. After routine business the following named gentlemen were nominated: Dr. Jamieson, Dr. Christoe, James Edge, Esq., A. H. N. Jenkins, W. J. McFarland, and Thos. Kells. All of these gentlemen declined in favor of Dr. Jamieson except Mr. Jenkins, who was the last to speak. He declined to be governed by rules of Convention, consequently a standing and unanimous vote was given in favor of Dr. Jamieson.

Hon. Thos. White then addressed the Convention in a short speech, full of wisdom and sound advice. Convention then closed with three cheers for Sir John McDonald, Hon. Thomas White, and the Queen.

At 2 o'clock in the afternoon a Mass meeting was held in the Agricultural grounds. A large crowd of very intelligent people assembled here to listen to the speeches of Dr. Sproule, M. P., Mr. John Blyth, M. P. P., and Hon. Thos, White who was just finishing and extensive and masterly speech as we left.

When Dr. Sproule, in the course of his speech, announced that the Home Rule bill had been defeated, a tremendous cheer went up from the crowd of very attentive listners. A banquet was held in the evening at the Middaugh House. Your town appeared to have turned out in full force; conspicuous among those present we noticed, Dr. Sproule, M. P., Messrs. W. J. McFarland, Douglas, Lucas, Ford, Turner, Mathews and Marsh. COM.

Toronto Musical Festival.

We are informed by the committee that the preparations made for this festival are being satisfactorily carried out. The monster Chorus is now rehersing in the Rink Music Hall which is being rapidly seated and it is said that the Chorus is efficient and enthusiastic, and will, assisted with the array of talent, contribute their share to the general success. The immense Music Hall is found to be most admirably adapted for such a concert, the fullest tone and the slightest pianissimo being alike claar and distinct. The project has been received with enthusiasm all over the Province as well as the city—upwards of $8000 worth of tickets have been applied for the Concert. Owing to the vast size of the Hall there are yet numbers of seats availably for each Concert, which will no doubt be taken by the Citizens of Toronto, and those visitors who will be attracted by the Excursions to the City. Programmes giving particulars of each concert are now ready for distribution. Those who intend going to the Festival, will find it to their advantage to correspond with Mr. JOHN EARLS, Honorary Secretary.

Why the Pirate Didn't Come.

"I've knocked about a bit in my time," said Charles Miller, a white-headed old Jack Tar, who leaned heavily on a crutch, "and I've seen some things on land and sea which were too deep for my grappling-irons. I went out to Australia in the sixties as a foremast hand on a British ship. I shipped for the voyage, but bad food and worse treatment so disgusted me that when we arrived at Melbourne I took French leave and for that matter the bulk of the crew was ahead of me. After making two or three coast voyages I brought up at Sydney and engaged for a trading voyage to the North-west, after sandalwood, spices, and the likes of that. I shipped on a small schooner called the Sparrow, the master of which was an Englishman named Davidson. There were seven of us all told, and we were loaded with a trading cargo. We had axes, hoes, hatchets, shovels, nails, wire, cloths, trinkets, whiskey, shoes, muskets, powder and shot, clothing, and almost everything else you can think of. We had two cannon mounted on deck, with a supply of small arms, and the captain made no secret of the fact that we might have use for them. You see, we were to round Cape York, which I calculate is the north point of Australia, and there bear up for Borneo. While the waters in that direction are a part of the Indian Ocean, you hear of the Java Sea, the Banda Sea, the Arafura Sea, and several others, and there are enough straits, islands, and channels to turn the head of the average captain. The Venture, as I understood it, belonged to parties in Sydney, though I think the Captain had a small financial interest.

"We had the mixture of good and bad luck to be looked for on the voyage, and finally rounded the cape. When we had been three days headed to the northwest we spoke a Frenchman, who gave us a tip. He had come down from the Spices, and on two or three occasions had been dogged by piratical native crafts, which had hesitated to attack him on account of his size. He had four cannon and a big crew, and on one occasion had been compelled to broadside a chap who evidently intended to lay him aboard. He warned our Captain to keep his eyes open day and night, and called out his good-by in a way to plainly show that he expected he had heard the last of us. While his news had no effect on our voyage, we went at it and put things in shape to make a fight if attacked.

"As we bore up we passed between the Timor Laut and the Aroe Islands and made the Banda Sea, and then navigation became more difficult. That sea is dotted with islands and reefs, and we had plenty to do to keep clear of them. We sighted a few sail, but got no alarm until well into Banda waters. Then, one afternoon, we made out a strange-looking craft to the north of us which had evidently come out from some port or bay along the chain of islands between us and the New Guinea coast. Though she had the wind with her she was in no hurry to close in. The Captain suspected her from the first, and there wasn't a man of us who did not give his promise to go down with the schooner rather than let her fall into the hands of the pirate. She came down on a diagonal course to cut us off, and at sundown, when the Captain went aloft with his glass to look at her, she was so near that he could make out enough to bring him down with a face as white as a new flying jib.

"'It's no use to deceive ourselves,' he said as we gathered around him. 'The fellow means mischief. While he has no cannon, he has men enough to eat us up in case he can put them aboard.'

"As for getting away from him, we had seen that he could easily outsail us, and, too, the wind was rapidly dying out. In half an hour more we were lying becalmed, and as night came down the fellow was within a mile and a half of us. Every one of us knew enough about those native crafts to know that this chap could be worked down to us by means of oars or sweeps, and there was no doubt that he would come. We got the big guns over on the starboard side, placed the muskets and cutlasses handy, and the cook was ordered to keep a hot fire in the galley and give us all the hot water possible. We knew that most of the pirates would be barefooted, and we hunted up all the old bottles aboard, and took all the glassware from the pantry, and broke the articles on deck. The broken glass would inflict savage wounds on their bare feet. You see we did not mean to be taken without having done our best, and it was understood among us that, sooner than have hands laid on us, we'd go overboard to the sharks. Capture would mean death, anyhow.

"Well, when we'd done all we could in the way of preparation, and when each man thoroughly understood what was expected of him as the attack begun, we had nothing to do but wait. He could sweep down to us in the course of an hour, but, much to our surprise, he did not appear when the hour was up. The Captain's night glass had been broken by accident, and we had no means of knowing what the fellow was about. The night was not over dark, and we counted on having him in sight for four or five minutes before he could lay us aboard. A second hour dragged away, and still no sign. Then a third went, and the men began to be nervous. The mate suggested to the Captain that we provision the yawl and abandon the vessel; and if the idea had been backed by the crew I think it would have been carried out. You see, the waiting had upset the mate, though he was a brave man. I think the Captain was a bit rattled, but he had made up his mind to save his schooner or go down with her.

"A third hour passed, then a fourth, and then we began to believe that we had been deceived. The stranger was a native trader, who meant us no harm, and the crowd of people on his decks might be islanders who were being transferred from one island to another. The Captain acknowledged that he had been too quick in his conclusions, and as midnight came the off watch turned in with many a joke on the way we had been fooled. I was on watch when daylight came. Naturally enough, we had an eye out for the trader, and as the gray mists lifted we got a surprise. In the quarter where we had seen him the previous night, but not more than a mile away, there was a great heap of wreck stuff on the smooth surface of the sea, but no trader. A boat was lowered, and I two of us pulled the mate to the spot. There were spars, planks, timbers, cordage, furniture, and other articles mixed up in a helter-skelter way. It might have been compared to a house which had been blown down by a hurricane. Among the wreckage we found dead bodies, though the sharks took them before we had made a close inspection. The hull of the craft was not there, but there were many bottom planks, a portion of the rudder, and all her sails and cordage.

"You will ask what had happened? but I cannot answer you with any satisfaction. The trader or pirate had been wrecked, but not on the rocks nor by wind or explosion. We had heard no noise from her during the night. Planks and beams were broken and shattered in a strange way, and none of us had the same theory about it. What do I think? Well, sir, I believe that the fellow was a pirate, and that he was working down to us when a whale rose under him. His craft was a light one, and the blow was enough to completely wreck it. If you have any better theory I shall be glad to accept it."

The Old Doctor's Story.

"I have a little story to tell you, boys," the old doctor said to the young people the other evening. "One day—a long hot day it had been, too—I met my father on the road to town.

"'I wish you would take this package to the village for me, Jim,' he said, hesitating

"Now, I was a boy of twelve, not fond of work, and was just out of the hayfield, where I had been at work since daybreak. I was tired, dusty and hungry. It was two miles into town.

"My first impulse was to refuse, and harshly, for I was vexed that he should ask me after my long day's work. If I did refuse, he would go himself. He was a gentle patient old man. But something stopped me; one of God's good angels, I think.

"'Of course, father, I'll take it,' I said, heartily, giving my scythe to one of the men. He gave me the package.

"'Thank you, Jim,' he said, 'I was going myself, but somehow, I don't feel very strong to-day.'

"He walke with me to the road that turnded off to town, and as he left put his hand on my arm, saying again, 'Thank you my son. You've always been a good boy to me, Jim.'

"I hurried into town and back again. When I came near the house I saw a crowd of farm-hands at the door. One of them spoke to me, the tears rolling down his face.

"'Your father!' he said, 'He fell dead just as he reached the house. The last words he spoke were to you.'

"I'm an old man now, but I have thanked God over and over again in all the years that have passed since, that those last words he spoke were, "You've always been a good boy to me.'"

No human being ever yet was sorry for kindness shown to others. Do not begrudge kind deeds and loving words, especially to those who gather with you about the same hearth. In many families a habit of nagging, cross or ill-natured gibing, gradually covers the real feeling of love that lies deep beneath.

And after all it is such a little way that we can go together!

The English Language in Japan.

There are a couple of Japanese journals published in Tokio, the capital of Japan, and not to be behind the times, Kioto now boasts a publication modestly styled "the pumphlet of the Kyoto association of english language." The enterprise of the proprietors of the "pumphlet" evidently evoked sympathy, for, in the specimen number, is reproduced the following advice tendered by a well-wisher:—

On first publication of Yeigi Shinshi.
About the middle of november 1885, on the Hinode sninbun saw an advertisement that you have the intention to publish a first book called Yeigi Shinshi to give the convenient method to the beginners who may want learn English Language themselves This however owing to the progressness of knowledge At present condition Japan shows great rapidity en commerce and trade if the people are ignorant with English language in some case take no small unprofit to carry an extensive business both on delivery and selling and on many other occasion It is therefore necessary for the Japanese to learn English Language before getting into trouble consequently the editor will perhaps take strict attention to spelling pronounciation etc correctly for the New Students Kobe

From Thomas A'Kempis.

Of two evils the less is always to be chosen. That thou mayest therefore avoid the everlasting punishment that is to come endeavor to endure present evils patiently for God's sake.

Dost thou think that the men of this world suffer nothing or but as little? Ask even of those who live most at ease, an thou shalt find it otherwise.

But thou wilt say, they have many delights, and follow their own wills, and therefore they do not much weigh their own afflictions.

Be it so, that they have whatsoever they will; but how long dost thou think that it will last?

Behold, the wealthy of this world shall consume away like smoke, and there shall be no memory of their past joys!

Yea, even while they are yet alive, they do not rest in them without bitterness and weariness and fear.

No man doth safely appear abroad but he who can abide at home.

No man doth safely speak but he that is glad to hold his peace.

No man doth safely rule but he that is glad to be ruled.

If thou wilt withdraw thyself from speaking vainly, and from gadding idly, as also from hearkening after novelties and rumors, thou shalt find leisure enough and suitable for meditation on good things.

"Are you pretty well acquainted with your mother tongue, my boy?" asked the school teacher of a new scholar. "Yes, sir," answered the lad, timidly. "Ma jaws me a good deal, sir."

A Palatial Indian Railroad Station.

The Great Indian Peninsular Railroad terminus at Boree Bundar, Bombay, now nearly completed, is one of the finest buildings in India, and is surpassed by few railroad stations in the world. The buildings contain over forty large offices for the administrative staff of the railroad, including the freight superintendent and clerks, the police, postal, audit, traffic, engineers,' agents' and provident fund departments. The agent, it may be explained, is the representative in India of the board of directors in England, and has, therefore, the powers of a general manager. These offices vary in size from the agent's chief clerk's office 23 feet by 12 feet to the agent's general clerk's office 64 feet by 48 feet. Many of the offices have private dressing and bath rooms attached, a very welcome luxury in the hot climate of India.

The accommodation for passengers is also very complete, including a central hall 82 ft. x 76 ft.; two refreshment rooms, 52 ft. x47 ft., and 47 ft. x 25 ft. respectively; four waiting rooms, first and second class, for ladies and gentlemen, with lavatories, etc., attached. Passengers arriving from up country and wishing to embark on the steamer, can find all their wants well attended to without going to a hotel The building is handsomely decorated throughout and great pains have been taken to secure good ventilation, and the best sanitary appliances.

The main staircase to the offices is 8 ft. 6 in. wide, and is surmounted by a Gothic stone dome, 40 ft. diameter. The main corridors average 12 ft. wide. The main building forms three sides of a quadrangle inclosing a garden with fountain, etc. The style of architecture is Italian Mediæval Gothic, which is said to be well suited to the climate, the massive stonework giving effectual protection from the sun. Work was carried out partly by European and partly by native contractors and workmen, under the direction of Mr. F. W. Stevens, chief engineer and architect; Mr. S Kaunderas, assistant engineer, and Mr. Madharas Janardhan, surveyer and overseer. The work has been in continuous progress since 1879, and the total cost of the station and offices will be about $1,250,000.

Alderman Jaehne's Conviction.

In August, 1884, the New York aldermen, by a vote of twenty to two, gave away the right of building and operating a street railroad on Broadway. This was done hastily in secret and against the veto of the mayor. The circumstances were so suspicious that a committee of the State Legislature was appointed to review the proceedings. Their investigation showed that the privilege was obtained by corruption. At their recommendation the Legislature annulled the charter. The right to operate the road is to be sold to the parties who will pay into the city treasury the largest percentage of their receipts.

While the State authorities were thus engaged the detectives were endeavoring to locate the bribery. Their efforts resulted in the arrest of fifteen aldermen of 1884 The other five suspected members of the board are thus accounted for: One has turned State's evidence (thereby securing freedom from prosecution), two cannot be dead, and two are dead.

The first case to come to trial was that of Henry W. Jaehne, four times elected alderman, and vice-president of the board for 1886 The most important evidence against him was his own confession, made to the chief of the detective force. In this interview he stated that he had received $20 000 in bills for his vote in favor of the Broadway measure. Two detectives who had heard this conversation from places of concealment corroborated the evidence of their chief. Jaehne's only reply was a flat denial of the story. The jury believed the detectives and at an early hour Sunday morning, May 16, returned a verdict of guilty. Sentence was pronounced May 20, the judge making a long speech to the prisoner, in which he expressed his horror at the enormity of the crime which had been committed against the people. The sentence was the most extreme which the law allows—imprisonment "at hard labor in the State-prison for nine years and ten months." The result of this trial will tend to strengthen public confidence in the efficiency of the laws against wickedness in office, and ought to teach a lesson that is needed in many cities.

Helpless Against Britain's Navy.

The New York Tribune, after rebuking its bellicose contemporaries which are talking so big in connection with the fishery dispute, thus speaks:—"Have the people of this country recently stopped to consider what a war with England would imply or what an absolute condition of unpreparedness for the defence of our seaports we are in should the English fleet appear in our waters? Every seaport in our Atlantic coast from Portland to New Orleans would be at its mercy. It could demand indemnity and destroy, if refused, without any effective resistance. We have not a foot on our coasts, Atlantic or Pacific, that could stand against its terrific ordnance. Its scores of light-draft armoured gunboats could go up the Hudson to Albany, up the Delaware to Philadelphia, up the Potomac to Washington, up the Mississippi to St. Louis, up the Ohio to Louisville, and we have not a gun or a vessel to stop them. In the war of the rebellion our wooden boats, with nothing but a thin shield of boiler-iron, went all over our inland rivers in spite of shore batteries. How much less resistance could be made to these six-inch steel-plated English cruisers! Suppose some of these same ironclad cruisers should go up the St. Lawrence and get through the Welland canal before our forces could seize it and destroy the locks, what is there to save Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Toledo, Duluth, Milwaukee and Chicago from bombardment? Not a vessel, not a gun! There is not a port on the coasts of the United States, nor a city on its great lakes and inland rivers that is not absolutely helpless against English naval power."

Wife—"How long would a fish be that would weigh twenty pounds?" Husband—"That depends. Why do you want to know?' Wife—"Why, Mrs. Jones says her husband caught a fish the other day that would weigh twenty pounds, and I was wondering how long it was." Husband (carelessly)—"The fish was about four inches long."

A LITTLE OF EVERYTHING.

A Boston paper recently printed a Spring poem signed with these strange initials, M U D.

The audacious English sparrow apparently fears nothing. A pair of these birds are actually housekeeping in the hood of an electric street lamp in Portland, Maine.

A Lockhaven, Pennsylvania, man asserts that he owns a locket containing a lock of George Washington's hair. The man never heard the story or he would possess the hatchet also.

A society has been formed in Switzerland for the cultivation of amiability. Its members are to be good natured, polite and agreeable always and under all circumstances. The test will be when they get the toothache or neuralgia, or when their corn-toe is stepped on in a street car.

New Jersey folks are extremely susceptible to hydrophobia. A mad dog is not a necessary adjunct. A boy, whose sister was bitten, worried about it so much that he actually took the malady from sympathy, and put the doctors to their wits' end. It took four men to hold the lad during his paroxysms.

In Wyoming territory the settlers grow their fuel by the acre. Sunflowers are used instead of coal. The stalks when dry are as hard as maple wood and make a hot fire, and the seed heads with the seeds are said to burn better than the best hard coal. An acre of sunflowers will furnish fuel for one stove for a year.

Jonesville has a very absent-minded citizen. Two mornings in succession, after milking the cow, he set the pail of milk in a corner and carried the milking stool into the house. On the third morning he took a basket of turnips to the cow, emptied them before her, and then began to milk in the basket. He had presence of mind enough to stop when about half through milking.

A correspondent in Montana, telling of the fortuitous discovery of silver mines, relates this incident: A prospector in New Mexico with the honored name of John Quincy Adams, found his haversack on fire, his prospector's glass having focused the sun's rays upon it. As the haversack contained about a dozen pounds of powder, he dropped it and got out of the way in a hurry. It fell into a crevice, and a large mass of rock was thrown up. Adams returned mournfully to gather up what might be left of his effects, and found an exceedingly rich vein of ore, which the explosion had exposed to view. He sold a third interest in his find for $16,000, and very consistently named the mine, "The Nick of Time."

A Baby King.

On the 17th of May booming cannon and flaunting banners announced to the populace of Madrid that a baby boy was born in the palace. The cable hurried the news under the seas to Cuba, where the Spanish guns again roared out their greetings to the future king of Spain. A committee of priests and nobles paid their respects to the infant sovereign at the royal palace. The date of the christening was appointed, and the Pope of Rome consented to act as godfather to the child. But all the splendor which accompanies the advent of the prince cannot hide the dangers and difficulties which must be overcome before these baby hands may wield the scepter. The boy's father, King Alfonso XII., died November 28, 1885, and the queen has since acted as regent for her little daughter, Mercedes, the heir-apparent to the throne. The birth of this prince sets aside the rights of his five-year old sister.

The Carlists play an important part in the recent history of Spain, and as they are liable to make further trouble before the young king becomes of age, their position should be well understood. The faction arose nearly fifty years ago. Ferdinand VII. was king of Spain, and having no sons he abolished in 1830 the law of 1713, which excluded females from the throne. Thus his infant daughter Isabella succeeded him (1853) instead of his younger brother Don Carlos. The Carlists—partisans of the latter prince—denied the right of the king to alter the succession, and resisted the rule of Isabella by force of arms. The civil war lasted seven years, ending in the defeat of the Carlists (1839). Don Carlos—Charles V. his friends called him—died in exile in 1855. His claims to the throne have descended to his grandson, the present Don Carlos. This prince appeared in Spain in 1873, when the country was in confusion, and undertook to win the throne by force. The opposing faction proclaimed Alfonso, son of the deposed Queen Isabella, as the lawful monarch, and in a vigorous campaign drove the rebels from the land (1876). The people of the northern provinces remain faithful to the cause of the pretender, and his appearance at any time would be the signal for a serious uprising. Since the death of King Alfonso, there have been rumors of a union of the two claims to the throne by the marriage of the princess Mercedes with the son of Don Carlos.

The birth of a male heir puts this arrangement out of the question, for the prince outranks his sister in the succession. It is probable that the queen-mother Christina will continue as regent until her son becomes of age, or until a revolution makes a new turn of affairs.

Too Early in the Season.

Young Featherly was a guest at Sunday dinner, and was somewhat amused because Bobby complained of there being no ice cream for desert.

"The weather is rather cold for ice cream, Bobby," he said. "Ice cream is only nice when the weather is hot."

"You like it in cold weather," grunted Bobby.

"Oh, no, I don't."

"Well," said Bobby, as if dismissing the subject, "all I know is that sister Clara says it's a cold day when you buy any. Ma, can't I have another piece of pie?"

The boy had been in the habit of going to the old lady's residence each succeeding spring and raking and cleaning up her yard. This year he went as usual. The old lady asked him what would be his charges. "Two dollars, mum," he replied. How is that? I never paid you but one dollar heretofore." "Well, mum, you see labor is capital, and we must insist on our worth." The old lady cleaned up the yard herself, and sent one dollar to the missionary society.

"What ails your chop?" asked the lady of the medical boarder, who seemed to be absorbed in studying the menu at dinner. "I think confinement has [illegible] was the reply. "Well, it's pretty [illegible] scratching," sighed the boarder, "trying to pinch and scrub and manoeuvre so as to make the ends meet." "Ah, well," said the boarder, holding the chop up for closer inspection. "now you [illegible] suppose that the ends are meat, but the trouble is that the thing is mostly [illegible] dle."

HEALTH.

Babies and Hot Weather.

Babies often suffer intolerably in the hot weather from too much or too little clothing. We remember one dear baby we knew clothed in a double woolen dress-shirt and with woolen socks on his feet all day. The drops of perspiration would stand all over his little head, and what made him cry so was that he cried from sheer discomfort? His feet needed no covering, and the woolen wrap should have been replaced by a thin cotton or linen garment during the warmer portion of the day, the dressing-gown to be at hand to slip on as soon as the air felt cool at night. Underclothing pinned about baby's waist in warm weather would be quite unsuitable. Why should we suppose it is necessary for baby to endure it? Physicians object to giving babies cold water at all, except an hour, or rather offering it for convenience. A bit of ice picked from the pitcher with a pin may be put on baby's tongue with good results, and best per-haps of all, when the little creatures grow cross and fussy, when they are a burden to themselves and everybody else, is the bath prescribed by wise mothers, big sisters, and aunties, of partially undressing the baby, wiping away the heat and dust with a soft, cool sponge or cloth, in a cool, quiet room, and with pleasant cheerful talk driving away the "tired" and coax-ing the little pilgrim to take a nap by the way. "There now, you've got to have a nap," and the rebellion in almost any baby soul, can be induced into something nice be-fore he knows it, ah, how we big folks en-joy it, and why shouldn't baby!

There is another than a hot side to the question, however. It is the taking cold. Cribs are left in draughts; baby is left to sleep in a room where windows are open, and the wind changes and nobody remem-bers the helpless little victim of our cap-ital thoughtlessness. There is one case where a baby was forgotten and left on a piazza through a heavy thunder-storm, but there are few houses where that could happen, happily. There are homes, however, where baby really suffers from lack of clothing. The infant mortality in a certain town, where there was always a chill in the air night and morning, was something frightful. Long-sleeved dresses (such as most babies now wear), with the feet and hands kept warm, might have saved many of these precious lives. The babies' deaths took the form of bowel trouble, some-times the result of a summer cold. There is nothing, everybody knows, that will re-sult in stomach of bowel pain like a hot application. Indeed, some people who have a tendency to such complaints, are seldom seen without their flannel bandage, and in case of disturbance of the organs mentioned above, that the flannel bag with smartweed therein, quilted into its fold will act as a charm.

Some physicians say everybody should wear flannel next to the skin all the year round; others say flannel should never touch the skin. The truth will be found to lie between the two extremes; wear flannel when it is needed, leave it off when it is warm. To be well, however, a person must be warm. If not warm naturally there is probably something wrong in the person's health, but until a natural circulation and warmth can be secured artificial means must be used. Of one thing be sure, babies' arms, and bowels must be taken care of; and the care of the outer part of the body is quite as important as attention to the inner wants. In conclusion, let us say a garment worn during the day should be worn at night by old or young. Cleanli-ness, if not splendor, is possible to all and necessary to health.

How to Disinfect.

Nothing which requires disinfecting should be submitted for about three hours to a temperature of 250 degrees in a chamber filled with sulphur fumes from a large quantity of sulphur. The chamber should be constructed as to prevent the fumes from passing off. No germs can stand this. After a room has been used by a person afflicted with any contagious disease, it becomes necessary to disinfect it before it is used again. This is done by removing and burning the paper on the wall, removing the carpet and other furniture, and exposing them to air and wind, and giving them a coat of varnish; by having the mat-tress made over new and the hair boiled; burning in the room three pounds of sul-phur, and by whitewashing, painting and papering the room anew.

Now that it is generally conceded that consumption is caused by germs which mul-tiply in the lungs, a method of disinfecting the lungs, which shall be harmless has been sought for, but as yet without avail. The use of creosote, the oil of the eucalyptus and carbolic acid have been tried, and, to a certain extent, they may paralyze or stun the germs and prevent their rapid increase; but the passages of the lungs are delicate, and the vapor cannot be brought very near them without injury, the good effects of light. But there is one method which does not fail to prove beneficial, and that is the inhalation of large quantities of fresh pure air. This is worth more than any dis-infectant for the lungs, and can do no harm.

The Pontiac and Pacific Railway.

Some forty-one miles have already been laid down and the contract has been let for seven and a half miles more. When these are finished the track will reach as far as Pembroke, which is the first crossing over the Ottawa river. The contract for ballast-ing the whole line is let and there are be-tween 300 and 400 men employed along the various sections. The line when completed will reach to Pembroke, a distance of 85 miles, and it is confidently expected that the company's trains will be some of the fastest time in the Dominion, it being in-tended to place 40 miles an hour as the mini-mum speed. The line will be finished to-wards the end of October.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

After the meeting had been opened with-out further accident than Samuel Shin breaking a window-pane with his elbow, and being fined $320 and costs, Brother Gardner arose and said:

"I presume de fack dat Uncle William Balls has passed from airth away am known to most' members of dis club. While he was not one of us, he was a land-mark known to all. He was an ole man, but ole age did not take him off, nor did sickness hev anything to do wid his demise. He just sot around an' died be-kase he was too good to lib any longer. He was a man totally widout vices, an' I hope nebber to see his like agin.

"I tell you, my friends, de man who has no small vices an' no weaknesses am a pusson which it will be well fur average humanity to avoid. He am jist about as bad as the pusson who am all vice.

"After de ole woman has cl'ared away de supper an' I has fed de pig we set down an' light our co'n-cob pipes fur a smoke. Smokin' am one of de small vices, but as we whiff an' puff I glance at de old woman an' bless de day I mar'd her, an' she glances at me an' I see a smile creep ober her old black face. Uncle William nebber smoked. It seemed powerful wicked to him, but he'd sot in de twilight an' groan an' grunt an worry Providence until even de dog was' disgusted.

"Arter we git frew smokin' we take de fiddle an' go ober to our darter Lindy's, an' when de young folks come in I play fur 'em to shake deir heels a leetle. Uncle Wil-liam nebber danced, an' de sound of a fiddle was nebber heard in his house. Accordin' to Uncle William, fiddlin' an' dancin' was nex' deah to highway robbery, but I'ze known him to keep a mule free days widout food or water kase the animal kicked at him.

"On extraordinary occashuns, when I hev tumbled ober the wheel barrer, run my neck across de clothes line or gone down cellar in a heap, I has indulged in cuss-words, some of which would measure six-teen inches from tip to tip. Uncle William nebber swore. If he struck his foot agin de saw-buck an' pitched head fust into an ash-heap he got up as humble as a licked boy an' smiled all de way into de house. He didn't swear, but he made de fam'ly dog hunt his cave, an' de chill'en believe dat a cyclone was in sight.

"Now an' den somebody drops in an' I play a game of eucher. It's a werry wicked thing to play keerds, but I'ze sorter takin' my chances dat if de Recordin' Angel can't find much else agin me de Lawd will pass me frew. Uncle William nebber teched a keerd. He left my cabin one night kase I brung 'em out. He wouldn't eben look at one of 'em, but he went home and kicked ober a kittle of soft soap kase his wife had let de pig break out.

"Dar am occashuns—yum! yum!—where I feel dat a glass of hard cider am just what is needed to take de kinks outer my weary constitushun. I wink at de ole woman, an' she slips down cellar an' draws some cider fur boaf of us. I 'spect it's wicked to drink hard cider. 'Deed, Uncle William cotched us at it one night, an' he went home horrified. One of his chillun had lost a cent, an' de good man spanked dat young'-un until some of his nayburs called in de police.

"I ain't holdin' it up dat anybody should be bad, but I do wish de preachers would understand, as mens' edder men do, dat our small vices an' weakness am de safety-valve which prevents explosion. Dar' am 'great temptashun befo' all humanity to be werry, werry bad. If men kin keep cl'ar of it by bein' jist a little weak an' foolish it am not a wise policy to batter at 'em from de pulpit fifty-two Sundays per y'ar."

NO GREECE.

Judge Chewso, after rising from his seat with an effort which broke a suspender square in two, offered the following re-solution:

"Resolved, Dat dis Lime-Kiln Club sym-pathizes wid Greece in her attempt to throw off de yoke of oppreshun an' put 5 cent cigars before de nebility of de ole world."

"Brudder Chewso, do you offer dat reso-lushun?" asked the President, after a moment of silence.

"Yes, sah."

"Whar' am Greece?"

"Dunno, sah."

"Whar' am de yoke?"

"Dunno."

"What has we got to do wid de nobility of de ole world?"

"I—I dunno."

"Whar' did you git dat resolushun?

"I dashed it off, sah."

"Well, now, you dash yerself down on your cheer, an' dean' let us heah no me' of you fur six weeks! When dis club has got frew sympathizin' wid de United States, Canada, Mexico, Cuba an' South America we may reach out furder. Until dat time comes your resolushun will lie under the table."

LATER ON,

The Secretary announced a communica-tion from Dr. Ephriam Sweet, of Quebec, announcing that he had a sure remedy for the cholera, and that in case the club would forward him $50 he would send on three barrels of it by fast freight.

Whalebone Hewker moved that the money be forwarded at once, and Way-down Bebee, Samuel Shin and Elder Toots arose to the second motion. Brother Gardner waved them down and said:

"De money will not be sent—not jist yit. In case de cholera dean' come along dis summer we'd be $50 out. In case de cholera does come, an' we held out fur awhile, de doctor will probably frow in an extra bar'l to close de trade. Three bar'l might possibly pull dis club frew, but it won't do no harm to hev an extra one on hand."

NOT AT PRESENT.

The Rev. Penstock arose to a question of privilege. One of the local papers had re-ferred to him as "saddle-colored coon who wanted to be Alderman from the Third Ward." The insult applied to the entire club. If he was a coon they were all coons. If he was saddle-colored, there were fifty other members in the same fix. He proposed a suit for damages by and in the name of the club.

"What fur," blandly asked the Presi-dent.

"Fur slander, sah! In de fust place, I'm not a saddle-colr'd coon, an' de next I dean' want to be Alderman."

"Brudder Penstock, de man who starts out in life calkerlatin' to frow a stone ebery time anybody yells at him has a hard job on hand. Nebber you mind your com-plexun. You can't turn blacker, an' I'm sartin you won't bleach out any whiter. As fur bein' called a coon, dat's all right. You kin git eben by callin' white folks 'possum. If you dean' want to be Alder-man nobody will fo'ce you to. Indeed, you hasn't one chance in a thousand of gittin' dar!"

"I'd like a vote of de club on de queshun of a suit fur damages," said Penstock.

A vote was taken, and he found himself entirely alone.

A Japanese City.

Prof. Morse, in his recent book upon life and scenes in Japan, points out many curi-ous contrasts between Eastern and West-ern civilization. Perhaps the difference is most marked in the general appearance of the large cities.

A view of Tokio, from some elevated point, reveals a vast sea of roofs, the gray of the shingles and dark slate color of the tiles giving a somber effect to the whole. The even expanse is broken here and there by the fire-proof buildings, with their pon-derous tiled roofs and ridges and pure white or jet-black walls. The temples also are conspicuous as they tower far above the pigmy dwellings which surround them. Their great black roofs, with massive ridges and ribs, and grand sweeps and white or red gables, render them striking objects from whatever point they are viewed. Green masses of tree foliage springing from the numerous gardens add some life to this gray sea of domiciles. There is, of course, no church spire. It is likewise a curious sight to look over a vast city of, it may be, nearly a million inhabitants and detect no chimney with its streak of blue smoke, From the absence of chimneys and the al-most universal use of charcoal for heating purposes, the cities have an atmosphere of remarkable clearness and purity.

The compact way in which in cities and towns the houses are crowded together, barely separated by the narrow streets and lanes which cross like threads in every di-rection, and the peculiarly inflammable ma-terials of which most of the buildings are composed, explains the lightning-like ra-pidity with which a conflagration spreads when once fairly under way.

Temperance and Assurance.

We take pleasure in chronicling the es-tablishment of a new life assurance com-pany in Toronto on a true and equitable basis, keeping separate branches for total and non abstainers and dividing the profits as made to each class; this is no new ex-periment as it has been tried and proved to be very successful by a number of the lead-ing British Companies, foremost among which is the "United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident Institution," whose experience for the past eighteen years shows a difference in mortality of nearly 30 per cent. in favor of total abstainers, al-though none but very select lives were as-sured in the general class.

The name of the New Company is the Temperance and General Life Assurance Company which has a good financial basis, a guarantee Capital of $100,000 and $500,-000 deposited with the Dominion Government for the security of policyholders. The Management and Directorate are composed of leading business men. The Hon. G. W. Ross is President, Hon. S. H. Blake, Q. C., and Robt. McLean are Vice-Presidents, and H. O'Hara, the Managing Director, has had many years' experience, and is well and favorably known as a successful In-surance man, and under his judicious management we have no doubt the Com-pany will prove a success.

You will notice in our advertising columns they desire applications for Agen-cies for this place and vicinity.

A Skirmish with Indians.

A Medicine Hat dispatch says: On Thurs-day last, the outpost in the Cypress, in charge of Corporal Ritchie, discovered a band of American Indians camped a few miles from their quarters. On proceeding to the Indians, encampment, the corporal asked them their business in the territory, and for an answer received a shower of bul-lets, which fortunately fell wide of their mark. Ritchie then commanded his men to fire, and one Indian was dropped. The redskins surrounded their wounded compan-ion and succeeded in carrying him off. Shots were now frequently exchanged and the chase kept up for some time, but on account of the timber all trace of the Indians was lost. On return to the place where the fir-ing commenced the police found a rifle and blanket, presumably the property of the wounded Indian.

Toronto General Trusts

COMPANY.

27 and 29 Wellington Street East,

Toronto - Ontario

President—Hon. Edward Blake, Q.C., M.P.

Vice-President—E. A. Meredith, LL.D.

Manager—J. W. Langmuir.

This Company acts as Executor, Administra-tor and Guardian, and receives and executes Trusts of every description. These various positions and duties are assumed by the com-pany, either under Deeds of Trust, Marriage, or other settlement executed during the life-time of the parties, or under wills, or by ap-pointment of the Court.

The Company also undertakes the investment of money in real estate mortgage securities; collecting and remitting the interest for a mod-erate charge.

The Company also acts as agent for the col-lection of interest or income, and transacts financial business generally, at the lowest rates.

The fourth annual meeting of the sharehold-ers of this company was held at its office, in this city on Monday, 10th instant. Owing to the absence in Ottawa of the President, the Hon. Edward Blake, the chair was taken by the Vice-President, E. A. Meredith, LL. D. A large number of the shareholders were present including Senator McMaster, Hon. Alex. Morris, Q. C., M. P. P.; Wm. Elliott, Geo. A. Co., Robert Jaffray, W. H. Beatty, A. B. Lee, J. J. Foy, Q. C., J. G. Scott, Q. C., A. T. Ful-ton, J. N. Lake and others.

Mr. J. W. Langmuir, the manager of the company, was appointed Secretary, and read the fourth annual report as follows:

REPORT.

Your Directors have pleasure in submitting their fourth annual report, together with the usual financial statement showing the opera-tions of the company for the year ended 31st March, 1886.

The result of the past year's business, as well as the increase that has taken place in all the main departments of the company's work, are not only highly satisfactory, but in the opinion of your Directors show very clearly the neces-sity that existed for the establishment of a company authorized by law to accept, in a cor-porate capacity, the responsible positions of Trustee, Executor, Administrator, and other important offices of a like character, which formerly had to be entrusted to private in-dividuals.

The income derived from the various branches of fiscal work is fully detailed in the profit and loss and other statements herewith submitted. It will be observed that the whole of the preliminary expenses connected with the organization of the company, as well as all the current annual expenses of every kind have been paid off, and out of the past year's profits your directors have declared a dividend of 8 per cent. per annum on the paid-up stock, and have added $5,000 to the Reserve, carrying forward the balance of profits to the credit of profit and loss, to be dealt with as the share-holders may decide.

Realizing the vital importance of maintain-ing a thorough, continuous and systematic in-spection and examination of the company's books, securities and records, and of keeping the Directors fully acquainted with the details of the business done by the Executive, a special committee, selected from the Directors who are not members of the Executive was ap-pointed in the early part of the year for the purpose of devising the best method of accom-plishing these objects. After much considera-tion a most effective system of inspection was recommended and carried into effect, and your Directors are much indebted to the Special Committee for the thorough manner in which their important duties were discharged, and for their comprehensive and practical sugges-tions.

The Directors would not be justified in pre-senting their report without expressing their great satisfaction with the manner in which the large, varied, and complicated business opera-tions of the Company have been conducted during the year by the Manager and his assist-ants.

Edward Blake, President.

Toronto, 8th May, 1886.

The Vice President, in moving the adoption of the report, and the Hon. Alex Morris, in seconding it, congratulated the Company on the continued and growing success that has attended the Company in all its various operations during the year, and drew attention to the great increase in the general volume of business, and particularly as regards the Trust Es-tates which have been placed in the Company's hands.

A resolution of thanks was passed to the President, Vice-President and Directors, as well as to the Man-ager and staff, for their zealous and careful discharge of their duties during the year.

The following shareholders were elected Directors for the ensuing year, viz: Hon. Edward Blake, Q. C., M. P.; Hon. Wm. McMaster, Senator; Hon. Alex. Morris, Q. C., M. P. P.; E. A. Meredith, LL. D.; B. Homer Dixon, Robert Jaffray, George A. Cox, Wm. Gooderham, J. G. Scott, Q. C.; J. J. Foy, Q. C.; A. B. Lee, Wm. Elliott, Jas. Maclennan, Q. C., J. K. Kerr, Q. C.; Æmilius Irving, Q. C.; T. G. Stayner, Wm. Mulock, M. P.; and Wm. H. Beatty.

The new Board of Directors then met and re-elect-ed the Hon. Edward Blake President, and Mr. E. A. Meredith, LL.D., Vice-President.

"Are you going to strike, ma?"

"I am."

"Don't strike. Let us arbitrate."

Sad Shooting Accident

The people of Thornbury were startled last Saturday to learn that a young man named Thompson, about ninteen years of age, son of Andrew Thompson, Esq., of the 7th line, had accidently and fatally shot himself with a shot gun. The unfortunate man was standing on the verandah of the house, and in the act of raising the gun which leaned against the edge of the verandah, when the hammer was pulled back and the gun discharged its contents under his chin, killed him almost instantly. His father was in Meaford at the time, received the sad news by wire from Thornbury. The deceased was a promising young man, and highly respected. The strongest testimony to the universal sympathy which is felt by the bereaved family, was borne on Monday last when over one hundred vehicles followed the remains to their resting place in Thornbury cemetery. Service were conducted by Rev. Mr. Farquarson, of the Presbyterian church.

The new C. P. R. city, Vancouver, B. C., was devastated by fire last Sunday. Fifty lives were lost and the whole place consumed, very few saving anything but what clothes they had on. Three thousand people homeless. The place will be re-built at once.

HOUSEHOLD.

Hints.

Once in awhile let your husband have the last word; it will gratify him and be no particular loss to you.

The newest color for table decorationsd only out about a week or two, is a vivid crimson. All kinds of flowers are produce, in this color to be used together. The crimson is relieved only with green, and the white tablecloth forms the ground. It should only be ventured upon in a dining-room furnished in a soft and neutral tint, and the color with which the lights are shaded has to be considered. Trails of flowers laid on the tablecloth are still a favorite form of decoration.

It seems, says the Lancet, that the little toy balloons or India-rubber bladders which children inflate with the breath may be readily reversed by inspiration and even drawn into the air passages. In two instances recently death has occurred by suffocation, a balloon of the sort being drawn into the opening of the glottis. This is a matter of danger which ought to be recognized. Parents and nurses should be on their guard.

The craze of table-turning has absolutely gone out of fashion, and it is quite a long time since we heard of our old friend planchette. A new thing—much more wonderful than planchette—is now coming into vogue. It consists of a rectangular board, two feet long by eighteen inches wide, on which are placed all the letters of the alphabet. A miniature three-legged table on small rollers is placed on the top of the board. Two persons sit down with their finger-tips on the table in the old fashion suitable for table-turning. A question is asked and the table forthwith moves about, and with its legs pointing to successive letters of the alphabet spells out the answer. There is something novel about this, though it is not likely to succeed in reviving the excitement which once gathered about moving tables and revolving hats.

Choice Recipes.

Crackers.—Rub four ounces of butter in one quart of flour, make it into a paste with rich milk, knead it well, and roll as thin as paper; cut them out by a small saucer, and bake quickly to look white when done.

Maple Cream.—One pound of maple sugar to half a cup thick cream; boil till sufficiently hard to make into cakes; turn into small cake pans to cool. An addition of one cup nut meats makes an excellent nut-candy.

Dried Apple Cake.—Soak two cups of dried apples over night, chop and simmer in two cups of molasses two hours, one cup of milk, half a cup of butter, half a cup of sugar, half teaspoonful of each kind of spice, sift two teaspoonfuls of baking powder in flour and mix pretty stiff. Is splendid and will keep three months. Good with cream or some pudding sauce in the spring instead of pie.

Mock Lemon Pie.—Two teacups of sour cream or buttermilk, two-thirds cup of sugar, yolks of two eggs, one tablespoonful flour, a pinch of salt; beat well together, then add two teaspoonfuls of lemon extract. Line the pie tin with crust as for custard, pour in the mixture, and bake until firm. Whil the pie is baking beat to a stiff froth the white of two eggs, add two tablespoonfuls of white sugar, one-half teaspoonful lemon extract. When pie is baked spread frosting on top and slightly brown.

Tough Meat Made Tender.—Take a thick slice of beef from the round, such as you can buy at the market for 10 cents per pound, with no bone and little fat. Get the butcher to split it almost open for you, so you have one large thin steak. No matter how tough, it will be tender as porter-house steak when ready for the table and quite as toothsome. Lay the meat out smoothly and wipe it dry, but do not wet it. Take a coffee cupful of fine bread crumbs, a little salt and pepper, a little powdered thyme or other sweet herb, and just enough milk to moisten to a stiff dressing. Mix well and spread over the meat. Roll it up carefully and tie up with twine, wound to secure it well, especially the ends. Now, in the bottom of your kettle fry some fat salt pork till crisp and brown, one quarter pound cut in thin slices (cost three cents.) Into the fat that has fried out from this pork put the rolled meat, brown it on all sides, turning it till it is a rich color all over, then put in half a pint of water and sprinkle over a little salt. Keep closely covered, adding a little water if it cooks away too much. If one likes the flavor of onion, add the half of a small one chopped fine. When ready to serve, unwind the string carefully to preserve the shape. Lay it on a platter with the gravy poured over it. Cut the meat in slices, through the roll as jelly-roll is cut by the bakers. The toughest meat is made tender and nutritious cooked in this way, and is equally nice warmed over next day.

The Engineer.

Like a flash of light the through express
Flies over the silvery line,
Bearing its burden of human souls—
On, on, through the gay sunshine.
There at the throttle-bar, brown and grim,
His deep eyes looking ahead,
The engineer in his oily clothes,
Stands firm and free from dread,

The track is his own, all must give way,
Yes! See at the town, on there!
The morning freight on the siding waits;
All is right; no call for care.
Ah, God! as open switch! One move
And his bar is quick reversed;
Then the air-brakes drag. Jump! jump! or death,
On your soul will do his worst.

The engine lurches upon the switch,
Just ahead there stands the freight;
He can save his train if he keeps his post;
For himself? Ah! well, ask fate.
A frightful crash; the passengers saved,
With their faces white with dread;
But under his engine, crushed and torn,
The brave engineer lies dead.

Think, as you fly 'mid the sunshine bright,
Or through the storm and rain,
By day and night, o'er plain and gorge,
Of the engineer of the train.
Think of the thousands of souls he holds
In his grasp, without a fear;
Think of the strain on nerve and on brain,
And pray for the engineer.

THE LIME KILN CLUB.

When Samuel Shin had struck the triangle and returned to his seat on the garret stairs, Brother Gardner arose and said:

"I take pleasure in informin' dis meetin' dat de Rt. Honorable Jumbo Smith, of West Varginny, am in de vanty-room. He arrove heah las' nite by de dirt road on his way to Canady, an' at my airnest sollicitashun he remained ober to address us. De subjick of his address am: 'Cyclones—deir Causes an' Cures.' De committee will bring him in."

The Reception Committe retired to the ante-room and appeared with the Hon. Jumbo. He proved to be a dark-skinned gentleman, built on the principle of a carrot—a good deal the heaviest at the top. He seemed to be somewhat unnerved at sight of the brilliant assemblage, but after drinking a glass of water he braced up and took the platform and began:

"My friends, I has giben de subjick of cyclones a great deal of thought an' study. It has bin de aim of de past forty years of my life to diskiver what caused an' what would cure 'em. Deir seems to be a great deal of ignerence 'mong ovill'd people as to cyclones. Do you reckon de pyramids of Egypt have anythin' to do wid 'em? If so, you am sadly mistaken. [Agitation behind the stove.] I have met ovill'd men who connected Cain an' Abel an' cyclones altogether, an' dey wouldn't give in to no argyment. If deir am any among you to-night, an' I 'spose deir am, who believe dat Noah's ark eber had anythin' to do wid cyclones. You am off yer base." [Agitation all over the hall.]

"My friends," continued the orator after gulping down more water, "do you 'spose it took three thousand years to make dis world. If dar am any sich in dis hall to-night let him stan' forth. Whenever I meet a ovillu'd man who says dis world am gwine to vand up befo' de year 1900, I sot him down as a pusson who would steal a $2 bill outer yer vest pocket if he had de chance. [Cheers and applause.] How many pussons in dis hall to-night am pested on de Drift Period? When did she begin to drift? Whar did she drift to? [Suppressed emotion.] Some pussons will tell you dat dis world was in darkness fur fo' hundred years arter it was made. Doan' you believe it! Day wasn't dar. What would be de use of all dat darkness? What would be de good of it?'

"How about cyclones?' called a voice.

"Yes, sah; I was comin' to dat. In the fust place, what am a cyclone? If dar' am any pusson in dis hall to-night, an' I 'spose dar' am, who thinks a cyclone an' a zephyr am one an' de same thing he has lived his life in vain. Day ain't any mo' alike dan an old bob tailed dog am like a new planer. [Slight evidences of amazement.]

"In de fust place, a cyclone has got to have a start. If it didn't get a start it would fool areun' in some pastur' or swamp until nuffin was left of it. What eber sets de air in sudden moshun may sot a cyclone goin'. It am a leetle feller at fust, an' if it doan' hit a barn or a side-hill it gathers strength an' momemtum an' becomes a vehicle of destruckshun. Bewar' how you sot a current of air in moshun, espechually if de day be sultry. No ovill'd man has any mo' right to fall off his wood-shed, an' thus precipitate a cyclone, dan he has to walk into a bank an' lay his hand on de money dar' exposed. 'Sposen your mule slips de halter an' runs outer de stable? He sot a current of air in moshun. If you run arter him set anoder current goin'. What am de result? A cyclone sweep ober a hull county, an' death an' destruckshun foller in its wake. [Sighs and groans.] If a ovill'd man should enter de watermelyon patch of a white man and the white man should find him dar', a current of air would be sot in moshun. If any ovill'd pusson should so far ferget himself as to be found in or about another man's hen-roost at an unseasonable hour of de evenin', de same result would foller.

"I has no sorter doubt dat many cyclones has bin sot in moshun in dis manner." [Cheers.]

The orator removed his collar, took another drink, and continued:

"If dar am any pussen in dis hall to-night, an' I 'spose dar' am, who would willingly start a cyclone to carry his own selfish ends, dat pusson kin not be removed from dis onfeelin' world any too soon. He am a human fiend. [Great applause.] Sartin white men have ridculed my theory regardin' de origin of dese destructive wind storms, but dey have failed to disprove 'em. Ridicule am de weapon of de man widout proofs. [Great uneasiness in the vicinity of the stove.]

"In conclushun I beg to thank you fur your kind attenshun. I have no connecksshun wid de signal sarvice or de Concord School of Philosophy. I grasp de situashun all by myself, an' when I has once get hold I neber let go. I am now on my way to Canady to collect a debt 17 years old from my uncle, an' to make some scientific obserwashuns on de lateral movement of side-hills. I expeck to return in a few weeks, an' shall then be in possesshun of a new lectur on airthquakes, which I hope to dellever in dis hall."

The orator retired amidst great and continued applause, and Whalebone Hawker moved that the thanks of the club be tendered him. The Rev. Penstock hoped that the motion would not prevail. The cyclone arguments that had been advanced were an insult to the intelligence of the club.

Pickles Smith didn't want to do the Hon. Jumbo or any other man an injustice, but he felt compelled to say that the stranger was off his base. He hoped the club would not indorse any such theories.

Waydown Bebee had wrestled with the cyclone problem ever since one of 'em came along and carried his mother and mule across two counties, and it struck him that the Hon. Jumbo was scientifically correct. He believed in counter-irritants and counter-currents, and should try several experiments before going to bed that night.

Shindig Watkins, Parson Davis, Trustee Pullback and others discussed the matter pro and con, and the President finally settled it by saying:

"We will neither indorse him nor declar' him a lunatic. De best way in all such cases am to strike de happy medium by takin' up a collecksshun of fifty cents fur his benefit an' praisin' his flow of language. Let us now be adjourned."

"I am glad this coffee doesn't owe me anything," said a boarder, at the breakfast. "I don't believe it would ever settle."

SUMMER SMILES.

It may be only a coincidence without any significance, but those teams taking the greatest interest in base ball have suffered most from labor troubles.

He (after surveying the company): "Mixed lot! Hardly a gentleman in the room!" She (innocently): "Not one—that I can see!"

In the Peshawur cemetery in India is the following amusing epitaph: "Sacred to the memory of Rev. ——, missionary, aged ——, murdered by his chowkidar. 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant.'"

Husband, (impatiently to wife.)—"I told you I only wanted half a cup of tea, and, as usual, you've filled it to the top. Don't you know what half full is?' Mother-in-law, (grimly.)—"She ought to by this time."

It is said that thousands of tons of leather scraps are ground up and sold for fertilizers. Gentlemen who have been raised on the toe of a boot will readily see how efficacious leather must be as a fertilizer.

Wife.—"Do you know why you prefer a game of base ball to the theatre?" Husband, (just from the game.)—"Shertainly m' dear, (hic,) it's more exciting." Wife.—"Exactly. You can go out nine times between the acts."

Curran's physician remarked to him, when he was on his death-bed, that he seemed to cough with more difficulty. "This is surprising," returned the wit, "as I have been practising all night."

A Sunday school teacher asked a little girl of her class if she had been baptized. "Yes," said the little girl, "two times." "Two times? Why, how could that be?" "It didn't take the first time," said the little girl.

"Don't you know now many three times ten is? Now, Harry," said the teacher, "if one loaf of bread cost ten cents, wouldn't three cost thirty cents?" "Maybe so at your bakery; but we deal with a baker that gives three for a quarter."

"Ullo, Jones! You in Paris?" "Yes; I've just run over for a holiday." "Where's your wife?" "Couldn't come, poor dear. Had to stay at home on account of the baby?' "Why your holiday will be half spoiled!" "Yes. Mean to stay twice as long, to make up!"

An Undertaker's Experiences.

"I've just returned from the house of a young married man who died last night," said an undertaker, "and his weeping wife told me she wanted his coffin made large enough to hold his gun and game bag, because he was so fond or shooting."

"I suppose you have a great many such queer requests," remarked a listener.

"Oh, yes. It was only about a month ago that a mother frenzied with grief, when I was about to put the lid on her daughter's casket took from a closet a satin ball dress and insisted upon having it used as a cover for the corpse.

"Then some people want favorite books, letters, Bibles, pictures, and such things buried with their dead. It seems to soothe their anguish to some degree, and you have to humor them. The queerest thing of the kind happened to me just after I went into the business. It would have been laughed at on a minstrel stage, but in a house of grief had to be tolerated with solemnity. The 10-year-old boy of a poor woman had died of fever, and I was engaged to bury him. Her neighbors had all gathered down stairs. I went up to ask her if there was anything more I could do, and she handed me a little bundle, saying, 'Please put this at the feet of Johnny's coffin. They are a pair of his old pantaleons, and the first I ever whipped him in.'"

A Shoemaker and a Naturalist.

Shoemakers have always made good naturalists. The latest instance reported of a shoemaker devoting himself with success to scientific pursuits occurs in Holstein. In the little Holstein village of Segeberg there lives a plain octogenarian shoemaker called Honelach, who for a great number of years has, while following the gentle craft, devoted himself to the study and collection of beetles. He has gathered together no fewer than 2,563 different kinds of beetles, 1,390 being native and 1,173 foreign. The whole collection is reported to be well preserved, and to be scientifically named and classified, its value being from a scientific point of view very great.

Not only does shoemaker Honelach possess a unique acquaintance with the habit of beetles, but he can boast a familiarity with the biological circumstances of Holstein beetles which for one in his humble condition is regarded as almost incredible. Entomologists of foreign countries, who desire information respecting the beetles of Sleswick-Holstein, have only to go to the simple shoemaker of Segeberg in order to learn all that is known. Though 80 years old Honelach is said to be as devoted as ever to his favorite studies, and to be constantly adding to his extensive collections.

Jimmy—"Did the feller wot sold it to yer ma have warts on his neck?"

A Terrible Fire

arouses the apprehensions of the whole city. And yet the wild havoc of disease startles no one. Sad to relate, women suffer from year to year with chronic diseases and weaknesses peculiar to their sex, knowing that they are growing worse with every day, and still take no measures for their own relief. Dr. Pierce's "Favorite Prescription" is the result of life-long and learned study of female complaints. It is guaranteed to cure.

A Lost Love.

BY LUCY STAPLETON.

How long my soul had loved her,
In years, I can not tell;
When first her eyes of sunshine
Came in my heart to dwell.
Through days of bane and blessing
Her soul my footsteps led;
We loved, and then we parted—
We met, but she was dead.

The west was red with sunset,
Turned gray the eastern seas;
We walked alone together,
Where blossoms gemmed the trees;
We heard the song of waters
Kissed by the summer wind,
But peace, the white winged spirit,
We nevermore could find.
The snow-white lilies sleeping,
The crimson rose leaves dead,
The wind that stirred the blossoms,
The words I said.
But heard the words to bless her,
I prayed of heaven to bless her.
While we two stood alone;
Then the white daylight vanished—
'Twas night, and she was gone.

To-day I stood beside her,
Where cold and still she lies
The earth is green around her—
Above, the summer skies.
And there I read a greeting—
From out her heart of dust
White roses bloomed and blossomed,
To prove her love and trust.

MY NEW FRIEND.

CONCLUSION.

The day appointed for the meeting, as recorded in the last chapter, was evidently to be an important one in my little history; for I was at length to see one of my employers, and I hoped that he would be favourably impressed with me. Perhaps I felt quite as much anxiety about my being favourably impressed with him. With his business, too, my first recognised transaction in the service would be completed; for the representative of the Belgian firm would receive, and hand me the delivery-orders for these goods in return for cash. It was essential, as Scate had pointed out to me, that I should manage all this, as my agency would be largely concerned in the Belgian trade, and it was well that these people should see at the outset that I was intrusted with the conduct of a big affair. I was pleased at this, of course, and Mr. Chelps was no less delighted than myself.

When the morning arrived, Mr. Chelps was in unusual spirits, hopping about with an agility quite remarkable for him, and looking remarkable, too, in an elderly invalid. He had already told me that he had succeeded in obtaining the money; he had received this on the previous afternoon, but it was in the form of a cheque; and foresaw some difficulty in its acceptance by the Belgian, who would naturally regard a cheque received by him by very different eyes from that with which they would regard one from such a man as Bunner, Wreggs, and Carrewhite. I had told Scate that this would probably be the case; and the latter, with his usual business, had promised that he would arrange so as to prevent any obstacle or inconvenience.

So remarkably brisk was Mr. Chelps, that, having obtained permission for our servant Lizzie to go on a rather long errand for him insisted upon opening the street door to callers himself, to save Mrs. Matley and myself the trouble. Not only did his buoyant spirits prompt him to do this and to sit in the morning or nearly so, in the office, ready in readiness, but he avowed his intention of buying 'quite a lot of flowers,' as he said; and so opened our front door at least half-a-dozen times to hail the passing barrows of roots, blossoms, or bulbs. Once or twice, I came up into the hall while he was struggling with these men; but each time he gleefully insisted upon my going back, as he did not intend Mrs. Matley to have the slightest idea of what he was going to buy. It was to be a surprise for her, he said.

So the morning wore on until punctual to the appointed time, Mr. Scate appeared; and almost directly after him the Belgian representative. This latter was a portly, respectable looking gentleman, who seemed rather surprised at the aspect of the house to which he had been summoned to transact such important business; Scate evidently caught the glance, and, ready as usual, said: "All very new here, sir—we shall have it moved in a few days. It was a long way to take you from the City; but Mr. Matley" "Matley is Mr. Matley"—we bowed to each other—"will have a great part of our Belgian and French connection business, and we wish him and his branch-house to be individually known to our continental friends. However, I'm sure you'll not mind waiting as the cash is here; and here it is."

"No, sir," returned the gentleman, who did not seem very much impressed by the rather ready jocularity in which Mr. Scate was much excelled. "As you say, it is no business of mine."

"You have the delivery notes, or warrants, of course?" said Scate, becoming grave in his turn.

"I have; here they are," returned the stranger; "and here is a receipt for sixteen hundred pounds cash."

"Quite right," said Scate.—"Now, Mr. Chelps, your cheque.—And here in good time is Mr. Wreggs; so you will have the opportunity and see the principal at once as I promised." As he spoke he ran and opened the door at which a loud knock had just been given, and ushered in a dark, keen-looking man who struck me as being one of the most sinister looking individuals I had ever beheld; an idea not weakened by his being loaded with much ponderous jewellery.

"This is Mr. Herdley, who represents Delmé & Co., sir.—And this is Mr. Matley our agent, sir, of whom I spoke to you.—And this is Mr. Chelps, a personal friend, who wishes, as I have told you, sir, to be allowed to join in your speculations."

Mr. Wreggs acknowledged each introduction with a short bow, accompanied in each case by a furtive glance which in a measure reminded me of my customer Mr. Jerry Cruncher.

"Will you see if these are right, sir?" said Scate to the new arrival, handing him the papers from Mr. Herdley, as it seemed the Belgian agent was called.

"Yes; they will do," said Wreggs; and with a little bustle in getting out his pocket-book, Scate gathered up the papers again and laid them on the desk.

"Now, Mr. Chelps," he continued, "Mr. Wreggs has kindly promised to bring some bank notes, as I know foreign houses are sometimes very reluctant to take the cheques of strangers.—Have you brought them, sir?"

"Yes," said Wreggs briefly, drawing out in his turn a bulky pocket-book and handing therefrom a packet to Scate.

"Thank you, sir.—Then, if you will give me your cheque, Mr. Chelps," continued the latter, "I will hand over notes of equal value, and give you the warrants besides."

Mr. Chelps, who had been gazing, as it seemed to me, in a kind of rapt admiration from Mr. Wreggs to the Belgian agent, and back from the Belgian agent to Mr. Wreggs, at this appeal produced a carefully folded paper from his pocket, and took thence a familiar-looking slip—the cheque. "It's on the Bank of England, you see," he said, as he handed it to Scate. "Your friend Mr. Wreggs knows all about that establishment." He laughed as he said this; and the laugh was repeated by Scate and Wreggs, but in very different tones.

The former took the cheque, and thrust the heap of notes, increased by some from his own pocket, to Mr. Herdley, saying: "You will find those right, I have no doubt, sir;" then pushed the papers, or warrants, to Mr. Chelps, adding: "And there is your security, sir."

Mr. Chelps clutched them eagerly, crammed them into his pocket, and then, to my surprise, thrust two of his fingers into his mouth, and whistled loudly. We all started in amazement, and looked at him; but before a single word could be spoken, the door of the room was thrown violently open, and then, to my greater amazement, four men rushed in. In the momentary glance I caught of them as they entered, I saw that two of them were certainly fellows of whom I had seen Chelps buying flowers an hour before, while another was as certainly the stranger to whom I had spoken at the bar of the Three Bells.

"What the'——" began Scate, turning fiercely upon Chelps; but ere he could complete his sentence, the old man had sprung from his chair full upon him, two of the strangers seizing Mr. Wreggs at the same instant.

"Get off, you old fool!" shouted Scate, with a savage oath; "leave go or it'll be the worse for you."

"On with the bracelets, Bill!" cried Chelps, in a tone utterly different from his usual voice, and maintaining his grip with overpowering force, despite of the tremendous struggles of Scate. The latter plunged and kicked desperately; but the stranger of the Three Bells assisted Mr. Chelps in holding his man, while one of the costermongers—actually one of the flower-men—pulled out a pair of handcuffs; and in thirty seconds from the time the door was opened, Scate and Mr. Wreggs were each handcuffed and each held in the grip of two men; while Mr. Herdley and myself looked on in helpless surprise and in my case at anyrate, some little dread.

When he released his hold of Scate, Chelps turned to me with a smile—a smile slight and quiet in itself, but which yet seemed to change him altogether, so that I should hardly have known the man. "You will apologise to Mrs. Matley, if you please, for our causing so much unpleasantness in her house," he said; "but it was unavoidable. We shall not require your assistance at present; and I wish you particularly to assure your kind little wife that this will do you no harm—rather the other way. I shall call again this evening, after attending the court with our friends."

Then turning to Mr. Herdley, he continued: "We shall want you with us, sir.—Now, Bill'—to one of the costermonger-like men, as I had once thought them, but whom I now began to see were something different—"call a couple of cabs and let us be off."

"But who—who and what are you?" I said, although I felt that I could have answered the question myself; "and what have these men been doing?"

"I am Sergeant Moley from Scotland Yard," replied my ledger. "My name may be known to you. I will tell you all about these gentleman when I call around this evening."

His name known to me! I should think it was indeed, as that of the most dreaded and successful detective officer of the day.

"Oh, it's you, is it?" hissed Scate. "If ever I get clear again, I'll put a bullet into you, if you are above ground."

"Ah!" said Chelps—or Moley—coolly, "that's what you are going to do when you are free. You are not free now, and my advice to you is to wait until you are, before you talk of your plans."

In another minute the cabs arrived, and the whole of the strange party took their departure; Moley again leaving an assuring message for my wife, while the stranger of the Three Bells paused in the doorway to give me a most expressive wink.

I need not say how startled Susan was by my account of the long expected interview; indeed, but for the message left by Mr. Chelps, in whom she still had great confidence, although he turned out to be a disguised detective—but for this, I am sure she would have utterly broken down. It was a great change, to be sure. All my bright visions, all my hope of returning prosperity, gone at a blow! and we were now as badly off, or even worse than when the hateful bills announcing the sale of my furniture were affixed to the house.

The day were slowly and miserably away, until we had almost given up the hope of seeing our late lodger, when a knock was heard, and Lizzie after answering it, came to the breakfast-room door, and with her eyes opened to their utmost power of staring, and a face expressive of the most intense astonishment, said: "Mr. Chelps, ma'am, has called, and wants to see you."

"Ask Mr. Chelps down," said my wife; and the next instant there was heard a quick firm step on the stairs, and then a dark, close-cropped, clean-shaved man, with keen small eyes, of square and powerful build, presented himself. He held out his hand, exclaiming: "What! don't you know your old lodger?"

We asked him to sit down, which he did; and after a few apologetic remarks to my wife, he said, in answer to our inquiries, that he would make a clean breast of it, and tell us all about the mystery. "And, as you know I am fond of a pipe," he continued, "I will take the liberty, ma'am, of having a whiff during my story. I always think a man gets on better if he smokes.

We of course made no objection; and Mr. Chelps—to give him once more his old familiar name—after a moment's delay in preparation, lighted his pipe, took two or three kindling "whiffs" at it, and then proceeded with his narration, thus:

"You know already that I am in the police, Mr. Matley—and you, ma'am—so I need not stay to explain anything about that. Well, in the course of business, during the last year or two, we have been put on the track of a very dangerous and artful gang of swindlers, who were up to all sorts of dodges. Sometimes they would buy goods, and pay for them with bills that were never met. Sometimes they paid for them in forged notes, which then got into general circulation. Sometimes they bought stolen goods and goods from fraudulent debtors; in fact there's no telling all the games they were up to; and yet we could never quite get hold of them. More than once we have caught the men who actually appeared in the work; but they were at the best subordinates; more often indeed, they were dupes themselves. At last it was pretty clear that one Edward Phillips, alias Scate, alias Nottingham Ned—by which last name he was generally known in flash circles—was deep in the business; and we were ordered to keep him in view.

"We got some information soon after this which proved of use. We were told that his firm—as you knew he calls it—were about to try their games on with some Belgian people, and that he was going to open a new receiving-house by the aid of a man who knew nothing of the firm or its plans. This man was you, Mr. Matley; but as we did not wish to be always catching the dupe, who was as innocent as the persons who had been cheated themselves, I hit upon a plan by which I hoped to penetrate a little farther into the mystery. I made inquiries about you, sir; and found what difficulties you were in, and what a good character you bore, so I could pretty nearly tell what line Scate would take with you, and when he would begin.

"I hit it, you must own, fairly well. I came to ask about your lodgings; and, to my delight, when I was asked into this very room, there sat the man I was most interested in. He did not want you to leave this house for a bit, so he early advised you to take such an easy-going, purblind, thick-headed old fellow as me for a lodger. Of course I had expected to take furnished apartments; but when I found how things were, I said I would prefer bringing my own."

"And so you did Mr.—Ch—Moley!" exclaimed my wife; "beautiful new furniture, which your married daughter, who had gone to Australia, had recently bought for you."

"Ah! yes, to be sure, my married daughter! her furniture!" returned our friend, with a broad grin. "Why, bless your heart, ma'am, I went straight from here that night and hired it. I haven't got any married daughters! haven't got any daughters at all. I'm an old bachelor."

"Good gracious!" exclaimed my wife again; "but you were quite overcome when you spoke of the loss of Mrs. Chelps. Do you mean to say"——

"I do indeed, ma'am," interrupted Mr. Moley. "We are obliged to do those things in the detective work. I could see you did not really like Scate; nor did Mr. Matley."

"I did not," I said; "I took a dislike to him from the first."

"But to go on with my story. Once in the house and seeing him, and hearing what he had told you, my work began to be as plain as ABC. It was quite clear he meant you to run your head into the trap, and buy the stolen goods; be the responsible agent; give the forged bills; get rid of the flash notes, and so on. But the thing wanted was to get him to play all his cards at once, so as to smash the whole concern; because you see, ma'am, I wasn't quite satisfied even with the chance of getting him, while there were others behind. So I talked about my ready money which I wished to have employed; and he jumped at the bait more readily than I expected.

"His plans were soon altered. Instead of going on gradually with you, he meant to have a big haul over this Belgian affair, and then sheer off. He meant, it was very clear, to sell the goods directly he got hold of them. He or his precious partner Wreggs, had already sounded some people about buying them, and found they could get very nearly full value on the dock warrants. Then there was my money—eleven hundred pounds, you know—the two things together making such a pull as he did not often get.

"The first transaction you had was with Mr. Jerry Wilkins. His name is no more Wilkins than mine is; but that don't matter. Well, what you bought was plate, sir, the proceeds of some burglaries at the West End.—Don't be alarmed ma'am; nothing can touch your husband, who had no knowledge of what he was doing. Well, I wanted to be sure of this; so I took care to listen, and to loiter in the front garden so that I could see Mr. Jerry when he called——"

"Then I suppose," said I, interrupting him, "that I really did see you looking over the banisters, and hiding at the back of the hall on both nights?"

"You did so, sir," replied Mr. Moley; "and on the evening he came I planted one of our people at the Three Bells, who sent a boy to your place with a message, and so got you out of the way, while I examined the parcel you had bought. But when you said you had had a "turn" through not being able to find the package, which was on a different chair from where you thought you had laid it, you gave me a "turn too; for while you spoke, I remembered I had left it on the wrong chair. However, it came all right; and Scate no doubt thought it was all right having succeeded in making you buy stolen goods. Yet if this Belgian affair could be brought off, he would not want you at all; that was plain enough.

"Well, sir, to cut this short, as you know most of it. I was aware that these men were desperate ruffians of the worst class. You would hardly think it, ma'am, but I am morally sure, though I can't bring it home to him, that this Scate has been in some of the cruelest things ever committed. So I got some of our men to call this morning, some dressed up as costermongers, one to ask a question, and so on, and I slipped them in without any one seeing them, and stowed them away in my room. When I whistled they were to rush down at once.

"All went beautifully. The partner Mr. Wreggs—a worse scoundrel, if possible, than the other—turned up just as I wished; while Mr. Scate having got hold of my cheque, paid the Belgian party in bank notes every one of which was forged. He had given me the chance to examine them beforehand. He was a little too clever. He had prepared false dock-notes too; and when he was pretending to let his partner examine the originals and so forth he changed the sets, so that he held the true ones, while he gave me the forgeries. When this was all done, I thought he had gone far enough, as I just gave my whistle, and —— Well you saw the rest."

"I did see the rest!" I ejaculated; "and thoroughly astonished I was to see it. But the strange gentleman—the Belgian Agent—was he also of the gang?"

"Oh no!" exclaimed Moley; "he certainly was not; and there comes in ma'am the best part of my story." (He always addressed my wife when he had anything specially interesting to say.) "If I hadn't got such a finish to tell, I don't think I should have troubled you by coming round to-night. Mr. Herdley was aware there was something suspicious in the business, although he did not know exactly what it was; and at first he thought, naturally enough, it was you Mr. Matley, who was at the bottom of it all. But I took care to put all that right; and shall always be glad I hit upon the idea of coming here to lodge if only for being able, through doing so, to clear away any suspicion of that kind. Well Mr. Herdley and Mr. Crobsen the head of your late firm, having married two sisters, are of course very friendly; and owing to what Mr. Herdley has been able to say of you this day, your late firm have taken a great interest in you; so much so, ma'am, that old Mr. Richards the head clerk having resigned, they will write to-morrow, offering your husband the post."

Susan and myself each uttered a cry of surprise here.

"It's quite right ma'am, you may rely," continued Mr. Moley, evidently delighted at the impression he had made; "you will have the letter to-morrow for certain. And who so fit as you, Mr. Matley, a man who knows the business, and who has always done his duty by the firm."

I cannot stay to repeat all we said, or how we thanked the kindly detective, or how he pretended to ridicule my wife for crying at what had ought to make her smile, while I could actually see a sympathetic glistening in his own eyes. He stayed with us long enough to smoke several pipes.

When he rose to leave, he said: "Now, joking apart, ma'am, just the sober truth, you know—don't you think I was pretty well got up as an old man?—pretty well for an amateur, you know!"

"It was wonderful," said my wife "I never was more deceived in my life. I never saw anything on the stage to compare with it."

Mr. Moley quite giggled with pleasure and pride on hearing this testimony to his skill, and went away on excellent terms with himself.

His prophesy was borne out to the letter. My old employers wrote to me the next day; and on the following Monday I took my seat as head of the counting-house in which I had worked so long as a clerk. Nor did Mr. Moley himself fare badly. The arrest of Scate and Wreggs led to other captures, and finally to the breaking up of the best organized and most dangerous gang of swindlers in London; a result which brought Mr. Moley promotion, a handsome present from some merchants, and repeated eulogiums in the press; the latter testimonials giving him, perhaps, the greatest pleasure of the whole; for with all his shrewdness and determination, he was rather a vain man.

For many years, until, indeed, he retired to his native county on a pension, Moley came once in each half year to dine with us; always on a Sunday, and always with presents for our children, who regarded him as a sort of extra uncle, and were always uproariously glad to see him.

An Essay on Anarchists.

The anarchists are good citizens in many respects. They aid largely in the support of several industries—notably the liquor business. They are practical prohibitionists and destroy liquor—a glassful at a time.

The don't like the police and seldom give them a chance to enjoy their society at short range. They are not very dangerous to any one who has land enough around his house to pasture a dog.

Being mostly of foreign origin, they are not, naturally, attached to the soil of their adopted country—although it is, as a rule, attached to them. They never demean themselves by agricultural labor.

The maligners of the anarchists say they are not workingmen. They are. They work the growler.

Taking Care of One of Them.

A Scotch farmer's son was one evening visiting his sweetheart, when a violent storm came on. He rose at once to take his leave, as he said he would require to see to the safety of his father's sheep. At this his lady-love, getting between him and the door, said: "I canna let you oot in sic a nicht. They can look after the rest o' yer father's sheep wha likes, but I'll tak' care o' ane o' them."

She: "And that scar, Major. Did you get it during an engagement?" He (absently): "Engagement? No; the first week of our honeymoon."

A DANGEROUS MAN.

Capt. John Miller, whose Hands are Stained with the Blood of Thirty Men.

Capt. John Miller, of Jimtown, Chickasaw Nation, was recently on trial at Fort Smith, Ark., charged with murder. This was not a novel experience to Capt. John, for, he has, according to his own account, killed thirty men during his life, not counting those he may have slain in the war. Though often tried for murder, he always escaped conviction, and in this last case was released on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction in the case.

Capt. Miller was born in Choctaw county, Miss., in 1816, and is now 70 years of age, though no one would take him for more than 50 years. The first man he ever killed was named Jones, and the killing took place at Columbus, Miss. He was tried for the crime and came clear. This was when he was quite young.

In 1848 at New Orleans, Miller and two Maley brothers, Henry and John, killed the three Turk brothers. Miller was a member of Jenkin's company in the filibustering expedition to Cuba, when Lopez was guillotined and Capt. John J. Quittington and fifty-two men shot. The difficulty with the Turk brothers occurred just after his return from Cuba. He was tried at New Orleans for the Turk killing and again came clear.

In 1849, in a difficulty near Shreveport, La., he killed three men—Murphy, Myrick, and one Carroll. He was tried at Shreveport and acquitted on the ground of self-defence. He cut the next two notches in his gun at Lickskillet, La., in 1859, when he and Alex Rudes followed two horse thieves from Texas, and Miller killed them both in a fight they made while resisting arrest.

In 1867 he killed a man named Taylor at Gatesville, Tex., with a knife. Tayler struck him in the head with a rock. He was also tried for this murder and came clear.

In 1866, while en route from Chickasaw Nation to Mexico, he, with six companions, was camped near Spivey's Ferry, on Red River, when a general row took place not far from his camp between five white men and a crowd of negroes. Miller and his men appeared on the scene after the five whites were wounded, and opened fire on the negroes, killing twelve of them. For this he was tried before Gen. Reynolds at Austin, Texas, and released.

In 1871 he pursued three horse thieves from the Indian Territory into Texas, and all three of them were killed. For this he stood trial at Granberry and was turned loose.

In 1879 he killed or was charged with killing Matthew Fletcher on his (Miller's) own farm near Jimtown. For this he was arrested and lodged in the United States jail at this place, where he remained eight months, and in 1880 was tried and acquitted. This he says, was the hardest trial he ever had during all his experience.

He has killed three other men in the Indian country, whose names he declined to mention, for the reason, he says, that they now have grown-up children in that country, and he doesn't care to have the matter resurrected.

The killing for which he was arrested this last time occurred in his own house in January last, where he killed a prominent young Choctaw named Israel Folsom. This killing, he claims, was an accident; that Folsom was drunk and drew a pistol for the purpose of killing him: that in trying to wrench the pistol out of Folsom's hands, it was discharged, the bullet entering Folsom's side, killing him. No one saw the killing except Miller's wife.

Miller served throughout the Mexican war in Capt. B. H. Cooper's company, Jeff Davis's regiment, and participated in the battles of Orizaba, Monterey, and the city of Mexico. At the close he returned to the Choctaw Nation, and, living on the outskirts of civilization, engaged to some extent in fighting the Indians.

During the war between the States he was a Captain in Gen. B. H. Cooper's command (same Cooper mentioned above as being a Captain in the Mexican war), during which time he took a hand in the battles of Wilson's Creek, Elk Horn, Prairie Grove, Gibson, Cabin Creek, and numerous small skirmishes, being most of the time in command of scouts, and saw much rough service. In fact, his company was recognized as "Independent," going where and when they pleased. He was quite notorious as a raider, and was constantly on the go.

At the close of the war he surrendered with Cooper at Fort Washita, Chickasaw Nation, but had made such a record that for a long time after the surrender he remained on the scout, living in Mexico for quite a while.

During all his adventurous life he was never shot but once, and that was at Weatherford, Texas, in 1872, when he was shot in the knee by a man named Denton.

Miller's mother was one-eighth Choctaw, and his father an Irishman, and his right in the nation comes from his mother. He has a wife and three children, and is very well fixed, having a large farm near Jimtown, well stocked with horses, mules, cattle, and hogs. Notwithstanding his age, he is as strong and vigorous as of old, and is still considered a very dangerous man, being very quick with a pistol and an expert shot.
